The remedy for this, however, lies not in the abuse by the judicial authority of its function but in the people, upon whom, after all, under our institutions, reliance must be placed for the correction of abuses committed in the exercise of a lawful power.

The fact that Congress generally does not use its powers to the last degree does not paralyze them. They are alive and ready for emergency, ready to operate according to the popular will, in line with the viewpoint expressed by Justice White that:

Although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless, emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of a living power already enjoyed.

In an emergency the congressional power may be applied to objects that in normal times constitutional limitations would save from the touch of government. The powers are the same and the objects are the same, but the emergency gives them a more intimate relevancy to government and usually the congressional powers are called into operation to regulate them. The public interest being paramount, the shield of the fifth amendment does not intervene and private rights are remarshaled for the public objective. The freedom guaranteed is not a freedom to destroy government. The unbridled exercise of so-called "rights" might accomplish such destruction in an emergency and by so doing vitiate themselves. The guarantor does not engage in joint bond with the guaranteed to accomplish mutual destruction. The emergency alteration of the usual relationship caused courts to regulate rents in the District of Columbia as the result of the war and caused the Supreme Court, in Block against Hirsch, to uphold the congressional act, there declaring:

Congress has stated the unquestionable embarrassment of government and danger of the public health in the existing condition of things. The space in Washington is necessarily monopolized in comparatively few hands and letting portions of it is as much a business as any other. Housing is a necessary of life, all the elements of a public interest justifying some degree of public control are present.

It was but natural to expect that in the course of the development of the United States considered absolutely or relatively as a world competitor a more concentrated organization of economic power would evolve with a paralleled political set-up. This could only be achieved at the sacrifice, to a sizable extent, of individualism. Mr. BECK is horrified at the regimenting of industry under the N.R.A., but I predict that as other countries become more intensely organized in the space of a few years there will be a vigorous public demand for an economic system here more closely knit with government, so that we can offset the organized economic powers of all nations.

A national breakdown may force regimentation to be ordered years before it would normally develop. The due-process clause being consonant with the general purposes of the Constitution and always having been implied in the original document enumerating the powers of Congress does not shift to block the public welfare when property rights step from behind it and assume a public character.

Mr. BECK becomes a violent extremist when he contends that the extended supervision over commerce destroys our devotion to the Declaration of Independence. Mr. BECK has forgotten the sage words of the Court in National Cotton Oil Co. against Texas:

To contend for these extremes is to overlook the difference in the effective actions and to limit too much the function and power of government by arguing from extremes. Almost every exercise of government can be shown to be a deprivation of individual liberty.

The stagnation of commerce, threatening the very existence of this Government, its Constitution and laws, was the emergency faced by the present Congress as it met in special session. All communities were calling for Federal help and Federal funds. Congress had to answer these appeals, obliging it to reestablish our economics so that the general welfare would be maintained thus replenishing tax fields for the repayment of Federal advances. A primitive psychology, lending itself to rash action, had been inspired by a surplus of commodities and lack of funds on the part of the public to purchase the necessary portions of the same. Our people were desperate. Bereft in a land of riches, they were provoked. Theirs was the position that Goldsmith sketched in The Deserted Village:

To see profusion that they cannot share.

Congress had two courses open—oratorical ballyhoo of better times, or drastic action within its powers. An aroused public would brook no fatuous speeches, and new constitutional remedies had to be found. Congress had to forego its comfortable and favorite pastime of droning declamation and apply itself to the serious work of solving the problem, much in the spirit of John Ruskin when he announced:

I feel the force of mechanism and the fury of avaricious commerce to be at present so irresistible that I seceded from the study not only of architecture but nearly of all art and have given myself as I would in a besieged city to seek the best modes of getting bread and water for its multitudes.

While the purpose of Congress was justified by all human instincts, its operations had to be within the scope of the force extended to it by the Constitution. The welfare of the country was at stake. Congress realized that the welfare objective stated in the preamble of the Constitution conferred of itself no legislative authority, and, further, that the so-called " welfare clause " in the body of the document was but qualifying the taxing power. Commerce had to be regulated in the sense that it required fostering and protection, which functions, said the Supreme Court, in the second employers' liability case, were within our power.

Research establishes that the Union was conceived with an idea of commercial nationalism. That the States became united in order to facilitate and free commerce here was amply demonstrated in the argument of Mr. Webster before the Supreme Court in the early case of Gibbons against Ogden.

Some excerpts from the report of Webster's brilliant plea which was sustained by the Court will be most encouraging to the N.R.A. advocates:

Few things were better known than the immediate causes which led to the adoption of the present Constitution, and he thought nothing clearer than that the prevailing motive was to regulate commerce, to rescue it from the embarrassing and destructive consequences resulting from the legislation of so many States, and to place it under the protection of a uniform law. The great objects were commerce and revenue, and they were objects indissolubly connected. * * *

In the history of the times it was accordingly found that the great topic urged on all occasions as showing the necessity of a new and different government was the state of trade and commerce.

The resolutions of Virginia in January 1786, which were the immediate cause of the convention, put forth this same great object. There is not another idea in the whole document. The entire purpose of the delegates assembled in Annapolis was to devise means for the uniform regulation of trade. They found no means but in the general government and they recommended the convention to accomplish that purpose.

We do not find in the history of the formation and adoption of the Constitution that any man speaks of a general concurrent power in the relation of foreign and domestic trade as still residing in the States. The very object intended more than any other was to take away such power. If it had not so provided the Constitution would not have been worth accepting.

What is that to be regulated? Not the commerce of the several States, respectively, but the commerce of the United States. Henceforth the commerce of the States was to be a unit, a system by which it was to exist and to be governed must necessarily be complete, entire, and uniform. Its character was to be described in the flag which waved over it E pluribus unum.

The founding fathers were accurate in their forecast that the life of the Nation depended on its commerce and that commerce among the States depended on the power of the Nation. The present Congress saw the very existence of the Nation, our form of government, and our underlying system of economics on the verge of dissolution. To revive commerce there were needed markets, the terminals of commerce. To build up markets, employment had to be stimulated. Thus the N.R.A. was devised, not as a pressure for product, but as a development of consumption factors. Commerce would not flow unless attracted by markets; and, if pending law, or a lack thereof, discouraged commerce, it was plainly the duty of Congress to legislate properly. The opposition to the then proposed commercial regulations could be classified with the opposition to the child labor laws, and this block takes some grains of comfort from the case of Hammer against Dagenhart, which was the medium of the Supreme Court nullifying as unconstitutional the child labor law. By a majority of one, the Court declared that goods produced by the impairment of child life might have the protection and fostering of interstate commerce. Mr. BECK'S school relies on this judgment as destructive to the N.R.A. The Court made this proposition:

There is no power vested in Congress to require the States to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition.

The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce and not to give it authority to control the States in the exercise of the police power over local trade and manufactures.

The marked difference between the child labor law and the National Recovery Act lies in the effort by Congress in the former to suppress an antisocial labor condition permitted in a limited area of the country, while in the latter Congress attempts to cure by legislation a Nation-wide economic disease which has absolutely clogged commerce. In the child-labor case conservative judges, bowing to the Cardozo philosophy that a judge is not cloistered, readily understood that a welfare lobby had induced Congress to invoke its commerce power to remedy an isolated social evil. The Court can, in the N.R.A., without looking beyond the act, ascertain the motives of Congress in the preamble to the bill. Moreover, no place was a sanctuary from the depression, and news of it has seeped into the most sacred temples. At least three members of the present court, Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo, are quite willing to have a judge be informed as to current events in the world outside. The Court understood that child labor shocks the moral sense of the national unit without working any present profound commercial harm, while general unemployment, leading to mass hunger, which means a failure of government in a country richly endowed, makes it imperative for government to readjust the commercial system which it bears. So it is repugnant to every theory of sovereignty to deny the legislative power to exclude from the stream of interstate and foreign commerce products offered under a system whose continuance would destroy the Nation. In the light of our jurisprudence it is tantamount to the suggestion that Congress may protect the morals by penalizing the transportation of women for immoral purposes; that it may protect health by banning misbranded drugs and adulterated foods; that it may discourage the gambler by barring lottery tickets from transportation in interstate commerce; but that it may not take action to conserve the whole of our commerce because of the police power of the States or the exaggerated right of the "rugged individualist", who generally associates with others in business enterprises, to liberty of contract.

In a case subsequent to Hammer against Dagenhart the Supreme Court sought to avoid the apparent restriction put upon the commerce powers of Congress in that very much condemned 5-to-4 decision, for when Stafford against Wallace came to the Court for its verdict the judges opened the way for Congress to assume the imperative control over commerce set out in the N.R.A. This litigation involved the validity of an act of Congress which attempted to regulate the methods of doing business by commission brokers acting within the various stockyards of the United States. There was no question but that in many respects these transactions took place all within a State and concerned matters usually left to State regulation, but the Court held that the act was constitutional on the ground that the activities of the commission brokers, unless regulated, were a burden upon interstate commerce. The Supreme Court has time and again upheld the power of Congress to suppress obstructions to commerce. The child labor law was to suppress a social evil which the involved States could themselves have suppressed. It is quite definite that acts in relation to interstate commerce come within the congressional jurisdiction. The Minnesota rate cases lend sanction to this broad power of Congress. Said the Court:

> The authority of Congress extends to every part of interstate commerce and to every instrumentality or agency by which it is carried on, and the full control of Congress of the subjects committed to its regulation is not to be denied or thwarted by the commingling of interstate and intrastate operations. This is not to say that the Nation may deal with the internal concerns of the State, as such, but that the execution of Congress of its congressional power to regulate interstate commerce is not limited by the fact that intrastate transactions may have become so interwoven therewith that the effective government of the former instantly controls the latter.

In United States against Ferger, Chief Justice White held that the power of Congress includes the authority to deal with obstruction to interstate commerce and with a host of other acts having relation to or influence upon interstate commerce, although not interstate commerce in and of themselves.

The Nation must act in uniformity toward all the States. That it did not in the child labor law; that it does in the N.R.A.

The early case of Groves against Slaughter established that Congress cannot pass a nonintercourse law as among the several States nor impose an embargo that shall affect only part of them. Congress did try to impose such an embargo in the child labor law, but in the N.R.A. an effort has been made to lift the embargo the depression clamped on commerce in and through all the States.

The lottery cases, the Mann Act, and the prize fight film law did prohibit interstate commerce advancing objects thought to be deleterious. The child labor law sought to obstruct innocuous objects whose manufacture was attended by group evils entirely in the consigning State. These interstate commerce laws, passed as a sop to reform and sustained by the Supreme Court, have shown a power in Congress over interstate commerce that does not concern itself primarily with the commercial aspects of the situations comprehended by the legislation. If Congress has power by prohibition to guard morality, it should have power by prohibition to guard business morality intending a conservation of markets and a free flow of commerce.

Congress, in the Antitrust Acts, the Grain Futures Act, and similar statutes, has been upheld in its efforts against deliberate strangulation of commerce. Surely Congress, when it sets up a plan of industrial cooperation as a stimulus to commerce, will receive judicial approbation. If Congress could provide for competition by the Antitrust Acts, it can regulate it by the N.R.A. Congress under the N.R.A. is making definite criteria of fair competition having already declared that the indefinite activity, unfair competition is unlawful.

The Federal Trade Commission Act declared that unfair competition in interstate commerce was unlawful. It did not define unfair competition, but left such definition to the courts.

Now, Congress has established a method to determine what unfair competition is in each industry. As the Court sanctioned the Federal Trade Commission, it will in all logic sanction the Recovery Administration. The Child Labor case, with a 5-to-4 decision passing on a statute whose object was plainly not commercial, will not prevail against the historical development of the interstate-commerce powers of Congress, the emergency inspiration for their fullest use and the disaster that would attend the invalidating of the statute. Could the then Court have anticipated the present national plight, it would not have stated itself so broadly to extinguish the child labor law. Read in the light of today the opinion can tolerate much editing. As Justice Brandeis has stated:

> The Court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning, recognizing that the process of trial and error so fruitful in physical sciences is appropriate also in the judicial function.

It is far from sane expectancy to believe that the nine alert and learned justices of the Supreme Court, not insulated from the economic terror abroad, will permit the opinion in the Child Labor case to thwart the effect of Congress to allay the depression. It will be difficult enough to cure it by any form of legislation, and certainly any bill less comprehensive than the National Recovery Act will be inconsequential.

It might be well for those who believe that Congress has taken too bold a step forward in this matter to read the startling observation made sometime ago by G. Lowes Dickenson, an English university lecturer, under the title "Letters from a Chinese official":

> Like the prince in the fable, you seem to have released from his prison the genie of competition, only to find that you are unable to control him. Your legislation for the past hundred years is a perpetual and fruitless effort to regulate the disorders of your economic system. Your poor, your drunk, your incompetent, your aged, ride you like a nightmare. You have dissolved all human and personal ties, and you endeavor in vain to replace them by the impersonal activity of the state. The salient characteristic of your civilization is its irresponsibility. You have liberated forces you cannot control; you are caught yourselves in your own levers and cogs. In every department of business you are substituting for the individual the company, for the workman the tool. The making of dividends is a universal preoccupation; the well-being of the laborer is no one's concern but the state's. And this concern even the state is incompetent to undertake, for the factors by which it is determined are beyond its control. You depend on variations of supply and demand which you can neither determine nor anticipate. The failure of a harvest, the modification of a tariff in some remote country, dislocates the industry of millions thousands of miles away. You are at the mercy of a prospector's luck, an inventor's genius, a woman's caprice—nay, you are at the mercy of your own instruments. Your capital is alive, and cries for food; starve it and it turns and throttles you. You produce not because you will but because you must; you consume not what you choose but what is forced upon you. Never was any trade so bound as this which you call free; but it is bound not by a reasonable will but by the accumulated irrationality of caprice.

We do not have to be as pessimistic about the outlook as this burning criticism of the modern industrial system would make one. Neither rose-colored glasses nor blue afford the precision required for a statesmanlike survey of the problem to be negotiated.

We would not be justified in a drifting policy, and our present hope of salvation lies in cooperation. The experiment proposed by Congress should be accepted in the spirit of Washington's Farewell Address:

> The experiment at least is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature.

The Court, as alert as Congress to safeguard the public welfare, will appreciate the tremendous pressure on Congress for legislation of a distinctively radical aspect to those who have survived on the laissez faire system and are prepared to sink with it.

A study of the Supreme Court action on the constitutionality of Federal legislation is heartening to the advocacy of the new policies. In the 144 years of its existence, in which period approximately 140,000 cases have been decided, the Supreme Court has declared only 60 congressional enactments unconstitutional. Every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the considered act, and unless it is squarely in violation of the organic law, the court will uphold the legislation.

The N.R.A. has already received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The court, in commenting on the present state of the Nation, made this striking and rather broad comment:

> It may happen that other emergencies prove more perilous to national life than war itself. War may tend to unify a nation. There are emergencies that tend to disorganize and to destroy. Another maxim is "the safety of the people is the supreme law." This concept must have its place in our laws dealing with emergencies that threaten national safety or stability. While the courts held that the Constitution is not suspended or set aside by war or national emergency, it is thought that the Constitution and all other laws must be read in the light of and, to some extent, subject to the primal and fundamental concept of the necessity for self-preservation.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act has already twice received judicial imprimatur the same principles of constitutional law being invoked on which the N.R.A. is predicated.

The opposition to the N.R.A. is put to it to understand how the Congress can regulate what is on its face a strictly intrastate commercial transaction. The principle of the N.R.A. extent of congressional control over such intrastate business has been affirmed several times by the highest Court. In the Shreveport case, which received much congressional attention, the Supreme Court supported the Interstate Commerce Commission in an action taken on railroad rates from Houston and Dallas to other points in Texas on the ground that such rates were discriminatory against interstate commerce transported from Louisiana similar distances into Texas. There Justice Hughes stated that the authority of Congress extended to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms, and that while Congress did not possess the authority to regulate the internal commerce of a State, as such, it did have power to foster and protect interstate commerce and to take measures necessary or appropriate to that end, and further, that the power to regulate interstate commerce was granted to Congress to make impossible the recurrence of the evils which had overwhelmed the confederation and to provide the necessary basis of national unity by insuring uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation.

Again, in the Wisconsin Rate case, where a somewhat similar situation was presented to the Court, Chief Justice Taft declared:

> * * * The principles laid down in the Shreveport case left no room to question the power. Congress in its control of its interstate-commerce system is seeking in the Transportation Act to make the system adequate to the needs of the country by securing for it a reasonable compensatory return for all the work it does. The States are seeking to use that same system for intrastate traffic. That entails large duties and expenditures on the interstate-commerce system which may burden it unless compensation is received for the intrastate business reasonably proportionate to that for the interstate business. Congress, as the dominant controller of interstate commerce may, therefore, restrain undue limitation of the earning power of the interstate-commerce system in doing State work. The affirmative power of Congress in developing interstate-commerce agencies is clear.

In Wallace against Callistan Packers Co., which was decided in October 1933 in the Federal District Court of California, the court was required to pass upon the right of the Secretary of Agriculture to enjoin a company from producing peaches in excess of its quota under the A.A.A. The court declared:

> It must be construed to give the Congress the power to regulate any and all commerce which may seriously affect the interstate trade. This court, with propriety, cannot make the narrow holding that the legislative body, under this analogous statute, is without power to regulate intrastate commerce as a proper means of achieving the desired regulation of the interstate commerce. In this and other respects the power to regulate must be construed to effectuate the broad purposes of the constitutional grant and of the national policy.

So from 1824, when Gibbons against Ogden was decided, to the present day, with the exception of the apparent detour of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor case, the tendency of our Federal tribunals has been to approve congressional extension of powers under the interstate-commerce clause.

The stability of Mr. BECK is shattered as he visions a Roosevelt dictatorship since Congress has delegated certain necessary powers to the President under the N.R.A. A dictator subject to a court belies the term, and Mr. BECK believes that Mr. Roosevelt's power will be drastically limited by the Supreme Court. Business in the emergency required a commander in chief. There was a far-flung cry in the business world for leadership, and when the life of the Nation chanced engulfment in the business catastrophe it was the certain duty of the President to accept that leadership and of Congress to give him the necessary powers. This delegation was constitutional, for Congress, after clearly stating its objectives, sets forth the principles and general methods by which the President was to achieve them. The legislative body followed its former course in the Tariff Act of 1922 when conferring rating powers on the White House. The various statesmen who lauded that clause in the tariff are highly critical now, and a little hysterical, but the Court is not swung by political considerations and will accept the theory of our Government relations favored by Chief Justice Taft in passing on the Tariff Act of 1922:

> * * * To avoid such difficulties Congress adopted * * * the method of describing with clearness what its policy and plan was and then authorizing a member of the executive branch to carry out its policy and plan and to find the changing difference from time to time and to make the adjustments necessary to conform the duties to the standard underlying that policy and plan. As it was a matter of great importance, it concluded to give by statute to the President * * * the function of determining the difference as it might vary.

While it is true that the Lever Act was declared unconstitutional although a war-time measure, there the difficulty was lack of precision as to violations. Criminal statutes must be definite. It may be that a particular code could be set aside on this basis, but that would only be charged to a lapsing from the directions set out by Congress in the act, and in itself be a violation of the N.R.A.

Perhaps the Court will not be pressed to pass on the fundamentals of the law, for the signatures to a code could readily be declared waivers of constitutional rights. The licensing provisions may be considered a form of duress and then the waiver value would be nullified, opening for the Court's attention the basic questions. Naturally the waiver theory would not arise if a nonsigner seeks the protection of the judicial branch of Government.

The Court can in the pending state of the Nation be both realistic and legalistic. Its own precedents favor, and the country demands, the new deal. The 9 judges are not 9 blinded hermits, stupefied by the dust of an old courtroom, crying out, "O Tempora! O Mores!" They advance with the times along a well-charted constitutional path. The judges will not inconvenience the public if it can be avoided. They will be mindful of the economic eruption that would attend an adverse decision on the N.R.A. It would be in line with declaring the Selective Service Act unconstitutional as the American Expeditionary Force was achieving victory. Two recent declarations from the bench are proof of this and are also prophetic of the fate of the N.R.A.

Justice Brandeis brought the Nation sharply to attention with this thoughtful declaration:

> The people of the United States are now confronted with an emergency more serious than war. Misery is widespread, in a time not of scarcity but of overabundance. The long-continued depression has brought unprecedented unemployment, catastrophic fall in commodity prices, and a volume of economic losses which threatens our financial institutions. * * * There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold, through experimentation, our economic practices and institutions to meet changing social and economic needs.

Chief Justice Hughes places his finger on the casual effect industrial decline has on commerce when in the Appalachian Coals case he reminded the country that—

When industry is grievously hurt, when producing concerns fail, when unemployment mounts, and communities dependent upon profitable production are prostrated, the wells of commerce go dry.

The Congress will not permit these wells to remain dry nor will the people nor the Constitution nor the Supreme Court. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House in support of the President's policy to restore the 1926 price level and at the same time provide sound money for this Nation. In my opinion, this question transcends in importance all other questions now claiming public attention. Its proper solution will determine whether the depression is to continue or whether we are to have prosperity. We have the economic power to control this situation. How shall we use this power? We have the power; what we need is a clear vision of the truth about it.

I am addressing myself particularly to those Members of Congress who are in sympathy with the President's program to alleviate human suffering, stimulate business, and bring happiness and contentment to all the people. The President has been very definite in his pronouncements. There has been no equivocation. His high purposes are understood, appreciated, and applauded by the people of the country regardless of politics. He wants the 1926 price level and a dollar that will have the same purchasing power from one generation to another. That is the issue; it is a clean-cut issue. I favor it, and I wish to address myself to those Members of Congress also favoring it and who wish to give the President their support, and who wish to help bring about the high aims set out in this policy.

Congress has definite responsibilities in this matter. It represents the constitutional authority of our Government specifically delegated to Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof. It is the fundamental law of the country. We cannot depart from it. Our Government cannot lawfully function to suit the whims of individuals or any group of individuals, for the power has been given to the Supreme Court of the United States to interpret and enforce the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, we have been in this depression for 4 years. To meet and cure the present distressing conditions Congress has conferred certain extraordinary powers upon two succeeding Presidents. The right of Congress to delegate such authority may be questioned, and that is one matter to which I wish to address myself for just a moment. There is such a thing as delegating authority to the Executive in order to strengthen his hand and give to him the necessary power to accomplish the things which are important or imperative. There is such a thing, also, as the Congress shirking its responsibility and placing its powers where they cannot be used. On the eve of the World Conference at London it was of the greatest importance that our President should be possessed of particular and extraordinary powers that we might give every possible opportunity to the London Conference to work out a price level that would restore prosperity. The London Conference failed to restore a price level that is in the interest of the United States. It immediately developed in that Conference that any effort of the United States to raise price levels was offensively called an "inflation plan." To raise price levels and at the same time have sound money is the object of the Government. It is the announced policy of this Government; and if that is inflation, those who are opposed will have to make the most of it. I claim that a stable price level and an honest price level is sound money, not inflation. And whether I am right in this statement, or not right, is one of the matters this Congress can determine.

This is the rock on which the London Conference had to split. There was no other result except one, and that was a surrender of our wealth of resources and our future prosperity.

The London Conference was a failure, as was predicted in this House of Representatives at the time the resolution was passed authorizing our participation in it. Valuable time was lost; but we could not oppose this method of dealing with this question, because it was forced upon the Congress by the uncontrolled and uncontrollable sentiment which had swept this country into the conclusion that an economic conference was the one way out. This conclusion was not founded upon intelligence and not upon reason. Was it founded upon propaganda spread over our country? That is quite a question!

But now that the London Conference is a failure, we can come back to the speeches that were made in this House by Representative Fiesinger, of Ohio, Representative Amile, of Wisconsin, and by others, pointing out the reasons why the conflict of interests between Europe and America in the matter of price levels could never be adjusted in a conference, and also pointing out that American protection could only be arrived at by independent American action.

And now, the most important question before the Congress, the Nation, and the world is to take up where the London Conference left off and to succeed where the London Conference failed in restoring the 1926 price level and at the same time provide this Nation and the world with sound money.

Mr. Speaker, we have not had sound money in the United States since October 1929. The purchasing power of our money has either been rapidly rising or rapidly falling. In both instances profitable world markets have been closed to us because of this condition. Our customers who used to purchase from our surplus of production can no longer finance their purchases, and we, as a result, are afflicted with what is called "overproduction." To restore our commerce and to restore our markets and be able to sell at a profit are primary steps toward curing this depression. Furthermore, it is a fundamental step; it deals with causes rather than results. All the legislation and all the activities of this Government during these past 4 years have been dealing with effects. They have represented an effort to distribute the burdens of depression rather than to cure the cause of the depression. We have placed 4,000,000 men on the pay roll of the Government, but the Government has no profits from which to pay these men. It must pay them from taxes and from borrowed money. We must relieve the taxpayers of the burden of maintaining millions of persons who are on nonproductive pay rolls or it will surely destroy this Government. We must restore profits, and we must restore them quickly. To restore profits we must remove the cause of depression and bring back those conditions upon which prosperity must be based.

You cannot have depression in a country of the natural wealth of the United States if you have free commerce in the world and a sound money system. There is no soundness in the money system where the money base has fluctuating value. Sound money implies stable price levels. Any one or any two or a dozen commodities may fluctuate in value, owing to overproduction or other conditions, but the whole list of commodities cannot be in a slump without proving that something has happened to your money base.

Gentlemen, we are facing the most critical period in our history, because we have not dealt with this question in its fundamental aspect during these 4 years. Nations all over the world are learning to produce what we used to produce for them. Spain can grow her wheat, Asia and Africa can grow cotton; the French chef is learning to make pastries out of Argentine wheat; the Englishman is learning to make bread out of Argentine flour with equal success to American flour; and Europe is showing that a preference for Chicago beef is passing to Argentine beef.

Mr. Speaker, we have delayed too long in intrusting the management of our money system to experts who are temporarily serving our Government and who are permanently employed, in the main, by the very interests that have opposed us in our efforts.

Price levels cannot be controlled by the banking interests of the world and also by the United States Congress. One or the other must assume control. The experts of the banking interests have been advising our Government. Congress alone seems to be able to secure experts who are divorced from these opposing interests. Three months ago, at a conference in the Treasury Department, one of the chief advisers of the Treasury made the statement that if this Government resorted to a certain action he would be forced to resign his position. How can a government function when its advisers are ready to go on strike unless their particular views are carried into effect? How can we, sitting in this Congress, know that one official who threatens to resign is not in harmony of thought with many others? How can we know that the officials of our Government are not threatening to strike, and other forms of duress, if the policies of the Government refuse to conform to the individual opinions of these men?

The framers of our Constitution, in their unequaled wisdom of statesmanship, took due note of these things in delegating this power to Congress; and so I say that Congress, acting under its constitutional authority, must support the hands of the President in this program he has so wisely pronounced—the 1926 price level, and stable, sound money.

THE FIESINGER BILL

There is a bill pending in this Congress which was pending at the time of the resolution relating to the London Conference. This bill is a second declaration of independence as applied to our economic life. It recognizes gold as the measurement of value. It puts the control of price level in the hands of the Government instead of in the hands of the international bankers, as it now is. It places the United States in control of its money system for the first time in the past 100 years and takes it out of the control of the hands of the European nations. It gives silver a monetary use. In effect, it doubles the supply of gold of the world. It prevents the manipulations of gold values. It restores the purchasing power of all nations now on a silver basis, and gives to them a world money.

If these statements are true, who is there that could oppose such a piece of legislation?

This bill was sidetracked in order that the London Conference might be given the opportunity to show what it could do. We have all seen what it could do—it could furnish a beautiful trap for the United States to walk into. We were saved from going into this trap, not by the action of our London delegates at the London Conference. They were prepared—and perfectly willing—to walk into this trap. I myself had a conference with Governor Cox, the chief representative of the American Government at this Conference, a few days before he left for London.

I went to this Conference with Representative Fiesinger, my colleague from Ohio, and Mr. John Janney, our economic adviser, at the request of President Roosevelt. We were in conference on the 24th day of May, and I was told by Governor Cox that "the program for the London Conference was not only fully arranged, but it was all agreed to." Governor Cox told us the details of this arrangement, and in my view and in the view of Judge Fiesinger and in the view of Mr. Janney, these arrangements would have placed a yoke upon the neck of the producers of wealth in the United States which would have proven so burdensome to this Nation that it might well have resulted at some future time in a war between this country and those nations who were in control of the powers that this program would have given them. This situation was saved by the action of the President of the United States, when he directly reversed his position and refused to acquiesce in or longer subscribe to such a program. In a word, the President broke up the London Conference.

The point I wish to make here is this: Why was the President in agreement with this program up to the time where he reversed his position? It was because of his economic advisers, and I emphasize now this danger that the President is hampered by the influence of economic advisers, who are not permitting him to clearly visualize what is the method and the way to secure the best interests of the United States.

We have here in this Congress the authority, and we must have the opportunity, to debate these matters. We have the opportunity to investigate in our committees, and we should have the opportunity to bring these very advisers of the President into questionings and congressional examinations so as to be able to dig down into the very vitals of the matter. It is impossible that the President can have the time or the opportunity for such investigation; and, as a matter of fact, I happen to know that as far as this Congress is concerned it cannot send its representatives to question these men as employees of the Government. We can only question them by bringing them before our committees. They will not yield themselves to questioning by our representatives, and I say to this Congress that if they did yield themselves up to questioning by our representatives we would be able to have a much clearer picture of what the thing is that they are trying to do, and we would have a much clearer understanding of why they have delayed so long in placing this Nation on a sound-money basis.

The President has declared for a dollar that will have a purchasing power which will be the same today and a generation hence. The President has declared for a dollar that shall have the purchasing power as represented by the 1926 price level. But how are these things to be accomplished? That is the practical question. H.R. 1577 is in accord with these policies of the President. Without any doubt, so far as I have been able to find out, this bill sets up the machinery for reaching this desired end, and there is no one who can charge that it provides for giving to the people of America a "baloney" dollar. On the contrary, it provides for a dollar that has as its measuring unit gold values of the 1926 price level. It is a dollar—and this is the important fact—that will carry with it in the markets of the world a definite intrinsic value, and the machinery is provided for regulating and maintaining this value.

The entire aim of this administration, in its announced money policy, is fully accomplished by the provisions of this bill; not only that, there is no other measure before the Congress that can claim such a result. Also, we have taken the power to regulate money values out of the hands of banks and groups of men who will further their selfish ends by selfish market operations based upon prior information. We have proven conclusively, in recent years, that groups of men occupying positions of power given to banks for the regulation of money values use this power selfishly. Manipulative operators in world moneys should not have anything to do with setting up a monetary policy for America. This bill sets up a regulating control based on the 1926 price level. When the value of gold is above this level it is brought down; when the value of gold is below this level it is brought up by one of two methods. First, the familiar method of retiring credits through the Federal Reserve bank, which we all know works splendidly when it comes to creating depression of commodity prices; and the other is by the method of regulating the metallic base. With $250,000,000,000 of debts in the United States to be retired it will be a long time before the machinery for the control of the metallic base will have to be operated to create depression.

A long period of prosperity will be needed to offset the extravagances and waste of the last 4 years and the extravagances and waste still continuing, and that will continue for the next 2 years, at least. If this bill should become a law, we will restore the basis of prosperity throughout the world within the next 60 days. But it will be a year or more, even then, before we can revive the vitality of the prostrate nations of the world by the normal opening of markets and the beginning of trade between nations that have a surplus and those that need this surplus. But we have in this bill the means of setting up a new monetary system and a new gold standard for the gold-standard countries as well as a new silver standard for the silver-standard countries, by simply restoring the destruction worked upon the money system by the action of nations that wished to put the world on a bank-control basis.

I want to say to the House of Representatives that the United States of America is the only nation in the world powerful enough to block this movement to put the world on a bank-control basis, and there is a definite reason for this. The reason is that the United States is the only great world power that is also a great producing nation. There are many nations in the world who are in the class of producers, but they do not occupy the position of a world power.

The wealth of the United States comes from its great natural resources, from its great power of production, and from its great manufacturing establishments. We produce our own raw materials, and the producers and handlers of those materials constitute the greater part of our market for our manufactured goods. That is why we are dependent upon high-price levels.

The nations of the world, on the other hand, who import their raw materials and who import their foodstuffs are benefited by the adversity of our producing industries. They profit if we produce our raw materials at a loss, for it lowers their cost of manufacture and their costs of living. At the same time that it lowers our scale of living it raises theirs. It is an instrument of exploitation, but we are the ones exploited. For this reason it is to the interest of the United States to stand alone and adopt a policy to prevent exploitation of this country. It is to the interest of the United States to adopt an American plan, and this American plan has already been promulgated and is before us in the form of a finished product in H.R. 1577.

I suggest for the serious consideration of the House of Representatives that we immediately study and debate this bill as a remedy for the cause of this depression and give it priority over any other measure.

In connection with the consideration of this bill there is a matter that appears to me to be one of supreme importance. I am sure that many Members of this House of Representatives will agree with me in what I am about to say. This country is flooded with propaganda. There is hardly a man that I meet who is not mystified on this important question. The mind of the average man is so confused that he cannot exercise the intelligent consideration that a voter in a democratic form of government must exercise. I wonder and I marvel at this propaganda. The question in the minds of many of you—and it is a question in my mind—is whether this propaganda has not some source or influence that is purposeful and aims to accomplish the very result that is accomplished in the mystification and complication of this important subject. I therefore urge upon this House of Representatives that we should investigate the source of all this propaganda which has created so much confusion on this question, and that we find out who is directing public sentiment in the United States on this vital issue. If a resolution to investigate this propaganda is not presented by some Member of this House, I shall do it myself.

For my part, I have tried to investigate this educational buncombe which is swamping the United States. My experience is that a man who has studied the money question is blocked from freedom in discussion with the sources of much of this propaganda. Although I am a Congressman of the United States, I cannot bring into the open light of investigation as an individual either the source of this propaganda or just what it is intended to do. There is a secrecy about it; there is a subtleness about it. Congress is full of it, and the minds of our people are full of it. I receive letters from my constituents urging me to certain courses, and on investigation find that they have no knowledge or real thoughts on the subject. They have been told to write to me and, in their ignorance and gullibility, they do write.

The Congress of the United States must immediately throw the searchlight of investigation into this dark corner, or we are going to be swamped with political influences that are manufactured in foreign countries and that will lead us to the surrender of our heritage of living, just as has been done on former occasions. Just as we did, for example, when we entered into the Jay Treaty with England, which was ratified on June 24, 1795, whereby we needlessly surrendered our right to the freedom of the seas. We fought the War of 1812 to regain this right, but the same political influences prevented even a discussion of this subject at the treaty which terminated that war. President Wilson vowed to regain the freedom of the seas at the Treaty of Versailles; but did we regain it? Is the Jay Treaty still in force?

When this Congress attempted to regulate the rates through the Panama Canal and England stepped in and told us what we could do about these canal tolls, there was a general sense of resentment throughout the United States. Why could not an American canal, built on the American Continent and with American money, be regulated by an American Congress? The answer was that political influences had summoned together a treaty-making body and that this country had sold the right to regulate the tolls, or, rather, given it away, through the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

In 1873 the American Government promulgated a law of greater consequence than any other monetary legislation ever enacted in its history. It adopted a policy of a change in the money system of this country which inevitably must lower commodity prices at least 25 percent. I am not going into the question now of whether or not this was a wise move. I am touching on the question, Why should the Congress of the United States pass such important legislation, so vitally affecting the welfare of the country, without debate? Why should we adopt a monetary policy without consideration?

I stand here and say to you that I have studied these records, and not only did we adopt this monetary policy without debate, not only did we adopt it without consideration but we adopted it without even knowledge of what we were doing! It was a piece of legislative trickery; it was a piece of work in the committee that was silent and secretive. Even members of the committee did not know what was being done, according to their own declarations. The President and Members of the House did not know they were acting on such a measure. But, as I have said before, the shadow of the hand of England rests over this enactment. Our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 2304 of April 9, 1872, contains the very significant announcement that—

> Mr. Ernest Seyd, of London, a distinguished writer, who has given great attention to the subject of mints and coinage, after examining the first draft of the bill, furnished many valuable suggestions, which have been incorporated in this bill.
> While the committee take no credit to themselves for the original preparation of this bill, they have given to it the most careful consideration and have no hesitation in unanimously recommending its passage as necessary and expedient.

Who did prepare this bill and why this reference in the RECORD to Mr. Ernest Seyd, of London? Were there not American advisers, who could have conferred with this committee, of equal authority and knowledge? Were there not American advisers equally informed as to the interests of the United States? What was the interest of England in this legislation? It was to have an enactment as it was made. What was the interest of the United States? It was exactly the opposite of this. At that period the interests of the United States were to formulate a sound monetary system, one adapted to the changing conditions in the world due to the demonetization of silver in Europe. It was to our interest to adopt a monetary system that could maintain a stable purchasing power for the profits of our resources; a system which could maintain a stable commodity price level, and a system that could maintain a sound dollar, recognized as a desirable money unit in the markets of the world.

Our problem today is exactly the same as our problem then. We are just 60 years late in addressing ourselves to this issue. This Nation stands on the brink of a precipice because of this delay, and yet we are so flooded with propaganda to prevent us from addressing ourselves to the subject that our whole Nation is engulfed with it. We must know without delay who the Ernest Seyds are who are acting in an advisory capacity in this Nation today, and we can know this only through an investigation by Congress. No man would dare oppose such an investigation who was not a traitor to this country. We are merely proposing here to protect this country. We are not making any charges or accusations against any specific individual or group of individuals. We are merely taking the precaution to avoid that history shall repeat itself. But, so far as I personally am concerned, I wish to say that I cannot make a satisfactory investigation as an individual citizen, and I find myself confronted by stone walls in any individual effort made to turn the propaganda that is flooding this Nation from assertion into fact and from mystification into simple truth. The country is full of mystification. The country is full of falsity and confusion caused by this subtle propaganda. This comes from somewhere. Things do not exist without a prior cause. There is a cause for these things; but, above all, there is a source of power to the opposition for an American program and an American plan which will assure to America that due protection to our monetary system and to our economic interests that is compatible with our position in the world. [Applause.]

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I was informed this morning that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty is on the calendar of the United States Senate for consideration within the next few days. If, by any chance, the treaty be ratified, it would be a financial tragedy for the country at large and for the individual taxpayer.

The grave danger confronting us at this moment is that the treaty has been backed and is being promoted by a well-organized and strongly financed minority, while the large majority of the people who do, and should, oppose it are unorganized.

The treaty should be given no further consideration until an official economic survey has been made by a competent unbiased United States commission and it can be proved beyond doubt that there will be adequate return on the gigantic investment that would be required.

It is interesting to consider what are the principal factors, communities, and individuals which favor and advocate the St. Lawrence canalization and what benefits will accrue or may accrue to these factors and to the remainder of the United States.

For many years there has been maintained in the city of Washington an organization whose only duty has been to work for and advocate the canalization of the St. Lawrence River. This is the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association. This association has been maintained by legislative appropriations and donations from lesser organizations in, according to its own statements, 23 States, extending from Ohio even to the State of Washington on the Pacific coast.

A large part of the propaganda which has been put out by the said association has consistently stated that this canalization would reduce the cost to American farmers of exporting grain, thereby increasing the income to the farmer and increasing the value of his holdings. Definite active effort to secure this canalization was started shortly after the war, while Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce, and the basis of the then argument was that the railroads had been, and would be in a few years, incapable of handling the traffic to the seaboard from the interior of the United States; that congestion of traffic would thereby be relieved and freight rates reduced. Thirteen years after those prognostications the traffic conditions, as assumed, are reversed, and the railroads are begging for enough freight to pay operating expenses.

These various States which have supported the said Tidewater Association consist of what may be called the north-central portion of the United States, and they have been told many times about how much they would be improved commercially and economically by the canalization of the St. Lawrence, often being told that it would save 10 cents per bushel on their grain freight rates. Believing in this propaganda, they have supported this association with their funds.

It will be remembered that a few years ago there was a tremendous flood in the Mississippi Valley and that some lives were lost; that there was much suffering and destruction of property. Following that catastrophe, funds were provided by the Federal Government for research and engineering; following this, many millions of dollars were appropriated, and work is now progressing upon plans not only to mitigate further flood damage but also to provide water transportation on the Mississippi River and its main tributaries, including the Missouri, Ohio, and Illinois Rivers.

Let us now study the St. Lawrence proposition in conjunction with the Mississippi-Ohio-Missouri work, and also in connection with the grain production and movement of our northerly neighbors.

Beginning in the southerly portion of the proponent area, we will take the wheat-growing State of Kansas—the greatest wheat-growing State in the Union—and find that the center of this State is practically the same distance in a straight line from the Great Lakes at Chicago that it is from the ocean at New Orleans, but that it is much nearer to the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers than to either of these ports. If the people in the Mississippi Valley really believe that the improvement of that stream for navigation would be of material benefit to them, to the extent of a large portion of the cost of its improvement, why should they be so interested in the canalization of a river in the northeasterly portion of the United States which in order to reach they must cross the other improved waterway; moreover, what benefit can accrue to the farmer of Kansas when the cost of shipping a bushel of his grain to the nearest Great Lakes port is greater from 30 to 60 percent than it is for the farmer in any of the Northwest Provinces of Canada which lie east of the Rocky Mountains?

Now let us see what great benefit can accrue to our people in the Dakotas and Montana from the canalization of the St. Lawrence. Certainly they, like the others, cannot expect the canalization of the St. Lawrence to make it cheaper to get their grain to our Atlantic seaboard. Therefore they must have been sold upon the idea of export grain and its influence upon other grain sales.

Maj. Theron M. Ripley, Buffalo, N.Y., an outstanding American engineer, who has made a life study of water supply and power, canals and drainage, makes the following statement:

> A comparison of the rates from these States to Duluth with those in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta to Port Arthur, from which points the rates east are the same, shows that from neither of the Dakotas can grain reach Duluth for as small a rate as from many points in the Province of Manitoba, excepting along the easterly border of North Dakota; and that an average rate for each of these States is as large or larger than the rates for the entire wheat-growing area of Saskatchewan and that they are in competition even with wheat grown in Canada under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains.
> Although the center of Montana is 330 miles nearer to Duluth than the center of the wheat-growing area of the Province of Alberta to Port Arthur, nevertheless the rate between the first two places is 50 percent greater than between the latter. In other words, the wheat reaching the ports of the Great Lakes from the large wheat-growing areas in the United States is already at a disadvantage with our neighbors to the north to the extent of 5 to 15 cents a bushel before it is loaded upon a lake steamer. How do the proponents of this waterway improvement expect this difference to be overcome by improving the St. Lawrence?

The preceding statements are important enough to be emphasized. In 1930 a revised report was put out by the United States Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Operations of the Shipping Board, and contains the following:

> It is well known that a saving of as little as one fourth of a cent per bushel will serve to divert substantial movements of grain. Indeed, the situation is such that the grain shippers must constantly be alert, not only with respect to the actual rates over the various routes but also the conditions affecting the promptness of movement, the situation at the terminal elevators, etc.

The proponents for the St. Lawrence canalization have repeatedly stated that it would save 10 cents a bushel on export grain, but they have never told how this can be done when grain is being shipped from Duluth or Port Arthur to Montreal for 5 cents or to New York City for 6 cents; nor how this amount can be saved when the entire cost from the upper Lakes to Liverpool is less than 12 cents per bushel. Neither have they told their constituents, who are a few hundred miles from the Lakes and where most of the grain is grown, that they were handicapped before reaching lake ports.

It is realized that corn and oats are produced in the United States in greater volume than wheat. In the United States in 1928 there was produced three times as many bushels of corn as of wheat, but a large proportion of the former reaches the consumer in the form of meat, while the latter still contains its identity in the loaf of bread. For this reason wheat is used as a basis of comparison for export as well as for transportation over long distances in the United States.

It is a well-known fact that the great prairie Provinces of Canada, viz, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, are primarily grain-growing areas; also that our Mid West and Central Northwest are foremost in this production. Neglecting the recent hectic years let us study the decade from 1919 to 1928 to get an idea of what happened in wheat production.

In 1919 there was produced in the United States 934,265,000 bushels of wheat and in Canada 193,260,000 bushels of wheat. In 1928 there was produced in the United States 902,749,000 bushels and in Canada 566,726,000 bushels. While the United States showed a decrease of about 28,000,000 bushels, equal to about 3 percent, Canada showed an increase of 373,000,000 bushels, or about 200 percent. Of this Canadian total, 96.1 percent was produced in the three above-mentioned Provinces. If the United States, with a population of 120,000,000, has a surplus with a production of 902,000,000 bushels, how much more of a surplus must Canada have with a population of 11,000,000 and a 556,000,000-bushel production?

In 1928 the 3 mentioned Provinces of Canada produced 544,598,000 bushels of wheat, and the 16 States from Ohio to Idaho produced 664,920,000 bushels. Of this latter amount but 12½ percent could reach Lake ports with rates equal to those from Manitoba, and only about 40 percent of this total production can reach the Great Lakes with a rate as low as the grain from any of the above-named Canadian Provinces.

In view of the foregoing facts relative to the transportation rates to the Great Lakes, would it not be advisable for those who are personally interested in protecting and enlarging the market for the Middle West farmer, to make a careful study not of Lake rates but of rail rates to the Lakes? Would it not be well to ascertain why it is that his Canadian neighbors can have their grain carried 1,250 miles for 15.6 cents a bushel, while he must pay 23.7 cents a bushel to have it carried 930 miles; or why his Canadian neighbor can have his wheat carried to Lake Superior, a thousand miles distant, for 14.4 cents a bushel, and he must pay the same amount of money per bushel for a carriage of 344 miles?

As a partial answer to the foregoing questions, attention is called to the following quotations from Senate Document No. 107, Seventieth Congress, first session, which was printed under date of March 15, 1928 (these rates are in force January 1934).

> The rates on grain for export from the western Canadian Provinces to Canadian Atlantic and Pacific ports are lower than the corresponding rates for export from the northwestern part of the United States to American Atlantic and Pacific ports. These rate differences * * * appear to be due directly * * * to certain charter provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That railway was, in 1897, granted a charter to build a line from Lethbridge, Canada, through the Crowsnest Pass into British Columbia, and was given a subsidy of $3,500,000 and a land grant. In return it agreed * * * to reduce the then existing rates from the western Canadian Provinces to Lake Superior ports by 3 cents per 100 pounds, and to maintain such reduced rates in perpetuity unless otherwise authorized by the Canadian Government.

The three western Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta produce 96 percent of all Canadian grain production. We quote again:

> The rail policies of Canada and the United States are somewhat different. In this country there is private ownership and management of common carriers, and such carriers are wholly dependent upon revenue derived by them from transportation. Practically all the railroads mileage in Canada is owned by two systems, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. The former embraces most of the weaker and high-cost lines and is owned by the Government of Canada. In 1925 the Canadian National failed to earn enough to pay interest on its debt by $42,197,664, and in 1926 failed to earn its interest by $29,894,072 * * *. These figures do not reflect in full the extent to which the Canadian National failed to earn its operating expenses and a reasonable return upon its investment, as the deficits shown do not cover such part of the investment in the Canadian National, which is represented by any other form of capital than interest-bearing debt.
> The Canadian Pacific is thus in a position to charge lower rates than would be possible if rates were made in Canada as they are in this country, with a view to providing a fair return upon the aggregate value of all railroad properly including the weak lines as well as the strong.

In 1931 the deficit of the Canadian National Railway was in excess of $84,000,000. In other words, the people of Canada paid over $1,600,000 a week, in taxes, in order to operate their railroad.

> Computed on a per mile-of-road basis, railway tax accruals in Canada in 1926 were approximately $267 per mile and in the United States, $1,591 per mile. If the tax accruals in the United States were on the same basis per mile of railroad as in Canada, they would have been approximately $330,000,000 less.

If relief is to be given to grain growers of our Middle West and Northwest, in order to put them on a parity for export with our Canadian neighbors, the foregoing facts demonstrate that a subsidy should be paid to the railway carriers large enough to permit them to lower the rates on grain to the lake ports or the seaboard in parity with their competitors to the north. Such a subsidy would not only benefit the farmers but permit the railroads to maintain their equipment, retain their employees, and prevent many of the security holders from going bankrupt.

In 1931 the Court of Chancery of the State of New York wrote:

> Railroads are public improvements from which the public derives a benefit, and the legislature can appropriate the private property of an individual for the purpose of such improvements, or may authorize an individual or a corporation to thus appropriate it upon paying the just compensation to the owner for the same.

This quotation is one of the bases upon which Chancellor Walworth based an opinion relative to the right of a railroad corporation to take private property. Attention is called particularly to the first part of this quotation: "Railroads are public improvements. . . ."

If the lawmakers can justify themselves in creating statutes which will turn over public money to farmers or any other private individuals, how much more would they be justified in turning over public moneys to a corporation operating a "public improvement." It would be much better to give the grain grower a chance for equal competition than to hand him a dole of a few dollars, and then take part of it away from him in taxes to pay for waterway improvements which would not help him and for which no proof of their economic justification has been confirmed.

This and fiction, theory and condition, hope and belief are at present so thoroughly mixed in general discussions of the proposed canalization that a thorough unscrambling must be made before any step, which cannot be retraced, is taken.

I have endeavored to place these facts before you, so that when the details of the project are submitted to the Members of the Senate you may be able to render them your verdict in the dispassionate light of fact and reason.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a statement regarding the sugar industry of the Philippines, prepared at my request by the Honorable Rafael Alunan, president of the Philippine Sugar Association and formerly secretary of agricultural and natural resources and secretary of finance of the Government of the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement regarding the sugar industry of the Philippines prepared by Hon. Rafael Alunan, president of the Philippine Sugar Association and formerly secretary of agricultural and natural resources and secretary of finance of the government of the Philippine Islands:

STATEMENT OF HON. RAFAEL ALUNAN RELATIVE TO THE SUGAR INDUSTRY OF THE PHILIPPINES

PRIOR TO AMERICAN OCCUPATION

Long before America went to the Philippine Islands, the sugar industry was in a highly developed state, Philippine sugar being able then to compete in the world's markets. In 1855 the Philippines exported 53,172 short tons of sugar. By 1875 the sugar exports of the islands had increased to 141,218 short tons, and in 1895 the Philippines reached its record of sugar exportation under the Spanish regime, exporting 376,401 short tons of sugar that year, a figure which was not exceeded until 1922.

During the 6 years of warfare caused by the Philippine revolution in 1896 and the conflict with the United States lasting until 1902, the sugar industry was ruined and paralyzed to such an extent that for over 10 years after American occupation sugar exports of the islands decreased to negligible quantities.

FIRST 10 YEARS UNDER AMERICAN SOVEREIGNTY

In the Treaty of Paris, providing for the cession of the Philippine Islands by Spain to the United States, the following provision was included:

"Article IV. The United States will, for the term of 10 years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States."

In view of this provision of the treaty, free trade between the United States and the Philippines could not be established until the expiration of the 10-year period provided for in said treaty.

However, in view of the appalling condition of the sugar industry of the islands as a result of the ravages of war and revolution, in response to the pleas of the American Civil Governor and American members of the Philippine Commission, Congress passed, on March 8, 1902, the Philippine Tariff Act, providing, among other things, that articles that were the growth and product of the Philippine archipelago going into the United States were given a reduction of 25 percent of the rates of duties imposed by the United States under the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897.

FREE TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES

On August 5, 1909, Congress passed the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, establishing free trade with the Philippine Islands and allowing sugar free entry into the United States to the extent of 300,000 tons.

During the consideration by Congress of this legislation, proposing free-trade relationship between the Philippines and the United States, the Philippine people opposed the adoption of this measure, and through their Philippine Assembly, on March 27, 1909, adopted a joint resolution petitioning Congress not to establish free trade on the ground that, in the words of the petition, "* * * Free trade between the United States and the islands would in the future become highly prejudicial to the economic interests of the Philippine people and would bring about a situation which might hinder the attainment of the independence of the said people."

It is pertinent to record here the statement of the venerable former Senator Elihu Root, who, when addressing the Senate on this subject in connection with the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill in 1909, establishing free trade with the Philippine Islands, expressed the Republican Party's viewpoint in the following words:

"Mr. President, we have some duties to the Filipinos. I am sure no Member of this body really desires to bring about a separation between the Philippine Islands and the United States by making our administration of the government of those islands a failure, by making the guardianship of the United States the cause of injury rather than a benefit, the cause of disaster and poverty rather than of prosperity and growth.

"The die is cast, Mr. President, upon which we have the responsibility for the Philippine Islands. No action of ours can reverse it. The good faith, the good name, the honor of the American people are all pledged to lead the people of the islands on by paths of growing prosperity and capacity for government to the point where they will be capable of supporting and governing themselves.

"We cannot fulfill that high duty by giving them money. * * * Gifts of money tend to reduce the independence of the individual character. We cannot fulfill the duty of making the islands successful in business, by retarding and confining their industry. We can fulfill it only by giving to them the opportunities to national power, to grow in the accumulation of property and the diffusion of wealth, lying at the foundation of civilization. We can fulfill that duty by making the people of the Philippines at once prosperous and intelligent."

In 1913, when the Democratic Party came into power, Congress enacted the Underwood-Simmons tariff law on October 5, which removed the restrictive provisions of the previous law of 1909 with respect to sugar and tobacco. Congressman Underwood, who sponsored the bill, explaining the removal of these restrictions on the floor of the House, stated as follows:

"The change in this paragraph of the bill is largely striking out the limitation on the importation of sugar, filler and cigar tobacco, and wrapper tobacco. We may leave the limit where it is, but we would leave it where it is to the shame of every American citizen. We could not honestly face those dependent people who give us free trade in their markets if we close our doors here. Because we do not want to stand and face that world in such a position as that and say (to the Filipinos) that under our law we command you to open the door, so that American goods can flow into your country, because we have the power to do it, and then turn around and say to them that on the only thing they can import, practically, into our country and make a market for, we will close our doors and prevent them developing their trade. I say that no true-born American citizen who faces this question fairly and squarely and understands the situation will consent to that."

That statement of Congressman Underwood has since been the guiding policy followed by Congress in dealing with Philippine products coming into this country.

The establishment of free trade had the immediate effect of attracting American capital into the islands for the development of the sugar industry. In 1910 a group of Americans obtained concessions in the Island of Mindoro, a heretofore undeveloped, uninhabited property, and constructed the first modern centrifugal sugar factory in the Philippine Islands. Two years later two other American companies established sugar centrals at Calamba, on the island of Luzon, and at San Carlos, on the island of Negros.

Thus, the modern development of the sugar industry was initiated by pioneering American business men and American capital, for it took a decade to convince the Philippine farmers of the advantages of improving their sugar production and manufacture along modern methods, and not until 1918–21 were the Filipino producers convinced of the necessity of modernizing their methods of manufacture and began to establish six so-called "bank centrals" with the financial aid of the Philippine National Bank.

The result of this change, the replacement of these thousands of primitive, inefficient, wooden carabao mills by modern centrals and factories, together with the recent improvement in methods of cultivation and planting of higher-yielding cane varieties, sugar production in the Philippines in the past two decades has naturally doubled and trebled as has happened in Cuba, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Java, Formosa, and other sugarcane producing countries when those countries changed their methods of manufacture from the antiquated mills to the modern factories. For it is a well-known fact that the wooden carabao mills then in vogue in the islands could only extract 30 or 40 percent of the sugar content of the cane while the modern sugar central factory recovers as much as 92 to 95 percent of the sugar in the cane. Had the cane harvested in 1895, which turned out a production of 431,000 short tons, been milled by the modern centrals now established in the islands, the result would have been a production of about 1,100,000 short tons.

For the 5-year period, 1902–3 to 1906–7, Cuba produced an average of 1,300,000 tons. Ten years later, from 1912–13 to 1916–17, Cuba almost trebled its production to 3,100,000 short tons.

Puerto Rico, for the 5-year period, 1897–1901, produced annually an average of 69,000 short tons. Five years later, 1902–6, it more than doubled its production to an annual average of 155,000 short tons, and still 5 years later, from 1907 to 1911 it quadrupled its production to an annual average of 285,000 short tons.

Hawaii had an average production for the 5-year period 1895–99 of 227,000 short tons. The following 5 years, from 1900–1904, its production increased to 362,000 short tons, or an increase of 60 percent, and for the next 5 years, from 1905 to 1909 Hawaii had an average production of 470,000 short tons, or more than double its production of the past 10 years.

The modernization of the sugar industry of the islands, which has taken place in the past 2 decades, has now been completed with the establishment of 44 modern sugar factories, with a normal productive capacity of 1,400,000 short tons, in the districts where formerly thousands of antiquated muscovado mills were in operation for centuries.

There has been very little increase in the acreage for sugarcane in the Philippines since the Spanish regime. In 1895, when the Philippines produced its record production of 431,000 short tons, there was planted to sugarcane that year at least 500,000 acres of land, as compared with 596,000 acres planted in 1921, and 633,000 in 1931. As a matter of fact the recent increase in production was mainly due to increased yields resulting from the substitution of the old native cane with new higher-yielding cane varieties.

EFFECT OF THE AMERICAN TARIFF

By virtue of the free-trade relationship which exists between the Philippines and the United States, practically all of the Philippine sugar exported abroad goes to the United States where it enjoys a preferential-tariff immunity of 2 cents per pound, as compared with Cuban sugar, and 2.5 cents per pound, as compared with foreign sugar. With the tariff preference Philippine sugar can compete with Cuban sugar and other foreign sugars in the American market. If subjected to a tariff of 2.5 cents (or even 2 cents) gold per pound, Philippine sugar could not be marketed in the United States at the present time.

The Philippine sugar industry has thus been developed within highly protective tariff walls both at the market in the United States and at the place of production in the Philippines, with the result that the industry cannot survive world's competition if the American tariff protection is withdrawn.

POLITICAL, SOCIAL, AND ECONOMIC EFFECTS

Being the most important industry, sugar has brought to the people of the islands immense benefits affecting their social, economic, and political life. These benefits may be summarized as follows:

(1) With the investment of approximately $250,000,000 the country has increased its wealth-producing capacity. This investment turns out an annual production of sugar valued at approximately $75,000,000, which is approximately 40 percent of the total value of all agricultural products of the Philippine Islands, including rice and other food products.

The investment in this industry is controlled by Filipino and American investors. Part of the investment made by the Filipinos was borrowed from their national bank, with encouragement from American officials. Very little of the capital may be called foreign capital. The total aggregate investments in the Philippine sugar industry amount to $251,512,535, as follows:

Investments in centrals	$84, 012, 535
Investments in lands	140, 000, 000
Crop loans	22, 500, 000
Miscellaneous investments	5, 000, 000
Total	251, 512, 535

Of the total of $84,012,535 invested in centrals, 40 percent is American investment, 37 percent Filipino, 22 percent Spanish, and 1 percent cosmopolitan, as shown in the following table:

Nationality	Number of centrals	Total investments	Percentage of total investments
American	12	$33, 815, 650	40
Filipino	22	31, 127, 894	37
Spanish	9	18, 276, 574	22
Others	2	792, 417	1
Total	45	84, 012, 535	100

The investment classified as Spanish includes investments made by two of the oldest established companies in the islands—one established 75 years ago and the other more than 50 years ago—so that it is generally considered in the Philippine Islands that these are Philippine investments. Moreover, many of the holders of the stock of the centrals classified as Spanish are in fact Filipinos.

Of the 45 centrals in the Philippine Islands, approximately 24, or more than one half of them, are small mills, with capacities ranging from 150 to 750 tons of cane per day. Most of these mills are financed by a group of Filipinos, while a few others were established by cosmopolitan investors, including Filipinos, Americans, and others. No Chinese are financially interested in the mills.

Practically all the lands devoted to the cultivation of sugarcane in the Philippines are tilled by Filipinos. Filipinos engaged in sugar cultivation in the Philippines, including their families, number 2,000,000.

Unlike other sugar-producing countries, which must rely on foreign labor to grow sugar, the Philippines depends solely upon native labor for its production of sugar. It is to be noted in this connection that, considering the social value of the sugar industry, the Philippines can claim that all of the benefits accruing to the people who grow the cane goes to 100-percent Filipino labor, owing allegiance to the United States, a record which cannot very well be matched by other sugar-producing countries supplying sugar to the United States.

(2) Of the 48 provinces, 17, with a population of over 7,000,000 people, or more than half of the total population of the islands, are directly or indirectly dependent upon the sugar industry. At least 2,000,000 farmers, laborers, and their families depend for their livelihood upon the growing of sugarcane.

(3) The sugar industry more than any other industry in the islands has been responsible for uplifting the standard of living of the Filipino people. Recognized authorities place the standard of living of the Filipino people 300 percent above that of the peoples of their neighboring countries.

(4) The money spent by the centrals and the planters for the purchase of supplies and materials required by the sugar industry amounts annually to approximately $30,000,000, or over 60 percent of the total money in circulation in the islands.

(5) The sugar industry is the main support of the Philippine Government. For every dollar of value of sugar produced in the Philippines the Philippine Government derives in sales tax and other taxes approximately 20 cents. The value of 1,283,000 short tons produced for the past crop aggregates $75,000,000, from which the Philippine Government will derive a revenue of $15,000,000. The income of the Philippine Government for 1933 is estimated at $24,000,000, so that it derives 60 percent of its revenue from the sugar industry.

(6) In 1932 the value of sugar exported from the Philippine Islands constituted 63 percent of the total value of all their exports, as may be seen from the following table:

Value of principal exports from the Philippines for the calendar year 1932

	To all countries		To United States
	Value	Percent	Value	Percent
1. Sugar and by-products	$60, 359, 000	63. 31	$60, 145, 000	99. 64
2. Coconuts and manufactures of	15, 455, 000	16. 21	12, 063, 000	78. 05
3. Tobacco and manufactures of	6, 399, 000	6. 71	3, 243, 000	50. 68
4. Manila hemp and manufactures of	5, 675, 000	5. 95	1, 893, 000	33. 35
5. Embroideries	3, 267, 000	3. 42	3, 252, 000	99. 53
6. Lumber and timber	835, 000	. 87	173, 000	20. 74
7. Hats	591, 000	. 62	435, 000	73. 71
8. Pearl buttons	244, 000	. 26	244, 000	100. 00
9. Other exports	2, 514, 000	2. 64	1, 200, 000	47. 73
Total	95, 339, 000	100. 00	82, 648, 000	86. 69

(7) The success of the cooperative system which has characterized the production of sugar in the Philippines has made the people realize the advantages of cooperative efforts among small producers and farmers. In other words, the sugar industry of the Philippines has become a model for a modern scientific development of their other agricultural industries.

AMERICAN-PHILIPPINE TRADE

Since the United States took over the Philippine Islands in 1899, America's trade with the Philippines has increased 40 times, from a little over $5,000,000 in 1899 to over $200,000,000 in 1929. United States sales to the Philippines since American occupation have increased 91 times, from $1,350,000 in 1899 to $92,600,000 in 1929. On the other hand, United States purchases from the Philippines increased 32 times, from $3,935,000 in 1899 to $124,465,000 in 1929.

These figures show a most significant fact; that is, that the purchasing power of the Philippine people for the products of American farms and industries have increased at a relatively greater rate than their sales to the United States.

Under the free-trade relationship between the United States and the Philippines, American exporters have practically a monopoly of the Philippine market. In other words, 97 percent of American products entering the Philippines are protected by the Philippine tariff. This monopoly of American exports to the Philippine market has been strengthened recently by the Philippine Legislature passing six amendments to the Philippine tariff law increasing the advantages of American products in that market.

Today the Philippines is the best market for American cotton goods, dairy products, canned sardines, and galvanized iron sheets.

As sugar constitutes 63 percent of the total value of all exports of the islands, the purchases of the islands from the United States are mainly paid for by the sugar exported to this country.

INCREASING POPULATION

When the United States went to the islands, the Philippines had but a population of around 7,000,000. However, after 35 years of American guidance, during which time we have improved our sanitary service, our population has doubled until it is now approximately 14,000,000. The Filipinos are becoming more and more Americanized in tastes and in habits, so that if their progress continues, it is reasonable to expect that in 10 or 20 years from now our population will have increased to 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 people, all of whom will have acquired the American ways of living, and who will constitute probably the best customers of America in the world. Recognized experts claim that the Philippines, properly developed, can support a population of from 60,000,000 to 70,000,000, or approximately half the inhabitants of the United States.

LIMITATION OF PHILIPPINE IMPORTS INTO THE UNITED STATES

The foregoing facts and data demonstrate the absolute dependency of Philippine sugar upon its free entry into the United States. They also demonstrate the truth that the political, economic, and social life of the Filipino people mainly depend upon the status of the sugar industry, which supports the Philippine government to the extent of 60 percent of its revenue.

Recognizing, however, the overproduction of sugar the world over, which brought about the present depression in the sugar industry, and appreciating the feelings of the domestic sugar producers here toward an unlimited expansion of the Philippine sugar industry, the sugar producers of the Philippine Islands are ready to cooperate and assist in the stabilization of the sugar industry either through a limitation of Philippine sugar imports to this country, based on the past year's imports, or through a quota system, such as provided for in the proposed marketing agreement, agreed to by the producers of the areas supplying sugar to the United States.

This and other similar adjustments or balancing of the benefits derived from the economic relationship between the United States and the Philippines will, in my humble opinion, bring about a harmonious and mutually advantageous economic intercourse between the two countries.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, Andrew Jackson's victory at New Orleans was won 119 years ago today—January 8, 1815.

He was the son of penniless Irish immigrants, born 2 years after they landed in North Carolina. Nowadays we are more exclusive. Under the strict immigration laws of today that Irish couple would be considered undesirable aliens and Andrew Jackson would never have seen the light of day in America.

He was born on the frontier—in the forest field of God—in a humble log cabin—

> One window shuts out the snow and storm,
> One window greets the day.

Old Hickory was a great soldier. His victory at New Orleans is one of the most remarkable battles in history. The English army outnumbered Jackson's forces. The American losses were 13. In half an hour the English had lost 2,600 men, including their commander, Sir Edward Pakenham, a brother-in-law of the Duke of Wellington.

As a soldier he saved a vast territory for his country. As a Democrat, he smashed the Second United States Bank and ended a dangerous monopoly. As President, he defeated the South Carolina nullification ordinance. As President, when France, then as now, a government of crooks and defaulters, repudiated her just debt to the American people, he proposed that American warships seize French ships by force on the high seas and credit the prize money to her account. France, of course, paid her debt, because Andrew Jackson was stern and unyielding in his determination to serve the American people and maintain the dignity of America and because he was right.

He was a soldier, Congressman, Senator from two different States, judge, President of the United States, implacable champion of the dignity and honor of his country, and preserver of the Union. He never turned his back to a friend nor his face from a foe. He was the idol of the common people. His spirit still lives and goes marching on. [Applause.]

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Mr. LAMNECK; and I also listened intently to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, who spoke immediately after the opening of the session today. I was impressed with at least two things which the gentleman from Maryland said. You will recall the gentleman spoke about Professor Sprague, who was in the Treasury Department as adviser to the Treasury after he came as adviser for the Bank of England. He was also monetary adviser to the Economic Conference in London. I have no fault to find especially with Dr. Sprague as far as his honesty is concerned, or as far as his patriotism is concerned. I know Dr. Sprague personally, but I want to say to you that it is dangerous to have the monetary policy determined by experts of the Government. The power to control the value of money is a more important power than the power of taxation. The constitutional fathers placed the power of taxation only in this body and nowhere else.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman then concurs that that power is solely, under the Constitution, in the Congress and cannot be delegated to anyone?

Mr. FIESINGER. I was just going to remark that very thing, that the power to "coin and fix the value of money" is solely within the power of the Congress of the United States and it cannot be delegated to anybody else in the world.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. I do.

Mr. McFADDEN. What does the gentleman say in regard to the delegation of that power to the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the gentleman mean the Constitution?

Mr. McFADDEN. No. What does the gentleman think of Congress delegating that power to the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. FIESINGER. I say it is illegal. I say it is unconstitutional, as far as it affects the value of basic money. Power to control credits may be in a different class.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman recognizes that that was done, does he not?

Mr. FIESINGER. Well, I think I recognize that fact; but it may be that Congress intended to delegate banking and credit control and not the control of the basic money values.

Mr. McFADDEN. The Federal Reserve System has the power to issue Federal Reserve notes, which circulate as money?

Mr. FIESINGER. It has. Of course, they are promises to pay. They are credits or I O U's of the bank.

Mr. McFADDEN. And that power was delegated by Congress in the Federal Reserve Act.

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes, sir; with the intent to regulate the volume of credit.

Mr. McFADDEN. And is being pursued by them, which gives the Federal Reserve System control over the money and credit in the United States.

Mr. FIESINGER. And thereby ability to at least influence the price level, which is a greater power than the power of taxation.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman knows that, in addition to the control of money and credit, the Federal Reserve System has other powers which they exercise from time to time for the purpose of affecting price levels?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly. But I contend the power as to credits did not necessarily include the power as to basic money. That power has been assumed. Congress should assert its constitutional powers and take back the management of the money base.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. What does the gentleman say about the delegation by Congress to the President to fix the value of money, under the farm bill?

Mr. FIESINGER. I think it was illegal, and the President did not want it. It was forced upon him. He never asked to have that amendment attached to the farm bill. It was forced upon him, and he is exercising the power because he was forced to exercise it; a power that he never wanted, and I say it is all illegal and unconstitutional.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has made a statement of his acquaintance with Dr. Sprague.

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman has been familiar with the activities of Dr. Sprague over the history of the Federal Reserve System, he well knows that Dr. Sprague has been in all of the conferences, practically, between the Bank of England, officers of the Federal Reserve bank in New York and other central banks, which have had for their purpose the dealing with national and international price levels. That was one of the functions that he was exercising as expert adviser of the Bank of England.

Mr. FIESINGER. Now, I understand that Dr. Sprague at the London conference was willing to peg the dollar to the British pound at $3.50, and, if he had done that, the price levels in America would have been in the control of the Bank of England, and it would have been so low it would have wrecked our national economy.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman please insert at this point what Dr. Sprague said about who should control the price level?

Mr. FIESINGER. I may say—I did not expect to answer that question, but Dr. Sprague, in a conference he had, stated he believed that the value of gold should be controlled by the British, because they were more competent, from banking experience, so to do.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. I will yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. He also made that statement after he was working for the United States as an adviser, did he not?

Mr. FIESINGER. He did.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman just stated that Professor Sprague was in favor of stabilizing the dollar at a $3.50 basis at the London Economic Conference.

Mr. FIESINGER. I understand so. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] said that in his speech. I did not know just what the figure was, but I have him for authority for that statement.

Mr. McFADDEN. Of course, the real facts in the case, I think the gentleman well understands, are that the British were not in favor of that, because it interfered with their world-trade relations and their ability to hold and continue to trade with the world on a basis that was favorable to Great Britain, but they are perfectly willing to stabilize on the basis of $4 or $4.05, and that is what they tried to do.

Mr. FIESINGER. Which would give them the trade of the world and lock up our doors as far as international trade is concerned. Why should we bind ourselves to England at any fixed value in terms of British bank-controlled paper money? In this bill (H.R. 1577) now under discussion we, as a nation, can control this important matter. We have the power to control it as an American policy. We do not have to tie ourselves to foreign management of money any more than we had to tie ourselves to the Federal Reserve bank. Credits are for banks—money is for Congress. This would have been a tragic mistake had these experts led us into an agreement with England in this matter.

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman please, it would have cost the people of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

Mr. FIESINGER. Absolutely. I would say not only hundreds of millions, but billions of dollars.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield again while he is answering questions?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman stated that the President was forced to accept the inflation amendment on the farm bill. Can the gentleman state who, in his opinion, forced the President to accept this amendment?

Mr. FIESINGER. It is only an opinion of mine. I was in Congress at the time and I knew what was going on. I think it was done in the Senate by certain Senators, and I think back of them there were certain interests which advocated it.

I really do not know just what the mechanics were. But my deduction is that the President did not want this power, that it was rather forced on him; and I think, subconsciously at least, he recognized that this power belonged to the Congress, and resides nowhere else under our form of government.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman think the President is going to use the power conferred upon him by that amendment?

Mr. FIESINGER. I shall make no predictions about it. But I may say I think the President is perfectly honest and honorable, and that his heart is in tune with the interests of the American people on this subject. The representatives of the people, however, are entitled to exercise this power, and no one else. There is a danger in delegating it to economic experts whose interests the people do not know.

Mr. MOTT. In view of what the gentleman has said, does not the gentleman think the inflation amendment to the farm bill should be repealed at this session?

Mr. FIESINGER. I would say so. I think it is unconstitutional. A constitutional duty cannot be delegated, and it is a duty under the Constitution that Congress coin money and regulate the value thereof. This bill H.R. 1577, is the only bill, however, yet offered which truly can claim to control and regulate the value or buying power of gold.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman of the opinion that the power given by Congress at the special session which gave the President the right to lower the gold content of the dollar unconstitutional?

Mr. FIESINGER. I think so, absolutely; and I think, if we had time to discuss the matter here, the whole theory could be exploded as against the interests of America.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. In connection with this policy which is now being carried out, if the gold content of the dollar is lowered 50 percent through the purchase of gold by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation——

Mr. FIESINGER. Right there, let me interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman says the policy is being carried out. There has been no step yet to revalue gold except what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is doing.

Mr. McFADDEN. I appreciate that.

Mr. FIESINGER. The President might stop this thing right at this minute and we would not be involved in any way.

Mr. McFADDEN. I understand, but along with that I think the gentleman will agree there would have to be some Executive announcement to clarify the situation.

Mr. FIESINGER. I think so.

Mr. McFADDEN. Following such an announcement, relationships would have to be established between the then dollar and the pound sterling and the franc, would it not?

Mr. FIESINGER. That is what I wish to discuss before the House. This bill H.R. 1577, provides a remedy for this very situation. It avoids the necessity for any entangling agreements, and it gives us the power to regulate gold. If we control the buying power of the ounce of gold, we do not have to worry ourselves about pounds, or francs, or guilders, or any other gold currencies. That is the big point in this situation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does not the gentleman feel, in view of the peculiar situation we are in now in this respect, such an announcement is a very important function in connection with it?

Mr. FIESINGER. It is of vital importance. Here is another important thing about that. I voted against the gold bill here. I think I was the only one in the Ohio delegation who voted against that bill, although there may have been two of us. Around the House at that time the talk was that the British lower courts had held it could pay its gold contracts with English paper money. Two or three weeks ago, however, the House of Lords reversed those decisions of the lower courts. What kind of a mess will this country be in if we devalue and then the Supreme Court holds that so-called "gold-clause contracts" must be paid in gold of the present weight and fineness, according to the contracts? It would wreck every corporation in this country which has outstanding contracts of this kind. Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious matter we walked into here, and I hope before we get through the President will retrace his steps.

If it were not for the solution to this problem, clearly provided in this bill, it would be very serious. But this bill is of no avail unless we debate it and understand it and act on it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is evident from the situation that now exists in regard to the purchase of gold and the change of value of the gold dollar that this country must and will inevitably go back to a gold basis.

Mr. FIESINGER. Absolutely. That is what this bill provides—a way to do. We can go back on the gold basis and at the same time provide American machinery for holding gold at the 1926 price level.

For the benefit of those Members who came to the Seventy-third Congress and were not Members of the Seventy-second Congress, permit me to say that in the Seventy-second Congress the Committee of Coinage, Weights, and Measures made an exhaustive study of the so-called "money question." I was a member of the committee and of the subcommittee and devoted a great deal of my time to the study of that question. The committee made a study covering several months. Many witnesses were called in, not a few of whom bore very distinguished names because of their activities in economics, commerce, and finance. This study was directed more from the world viewpoint, to see what bearing, if any, the legislative enactments and monetary policies of other countries had upon our domestic economy. We studied the question of the sufficiency of the gold supply, the causes of the erratic movements in gold, its rarification, the stagnation of world commerce and domestic trade, the disease of unemployment, underconsumption, and lack of purchasing power. In short, we ran the whole gamut to find out if possible the basic cause of the depression.

But what I should like to emphasize is the important fact that this study reaped a harvest in results. Not only have we a bill before Congress which, in a very practical and very simple way, gives an American plan for controlling gold buying power but also we have a full report from this committee.

The committee announced its findings to the House on May 14, 1932, in House Document 1320, giving its views as to the cause of the depression, and I am sorry to say that so little publicity has been given to this report that probably not more than two or three men now in the hearing of my voice, outside of the members of this committee, ever read that report. Yet it is one of the most important documents, in my judgment, that ever issued from a committee of Congress. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] read it, if I am not mistaken. I believe the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK and Mr. WEST] read it; three Members within the hearing of my voice. I want to read this to you now since you would not read it yourselves. I want to read to you what the committee said was the cause of the depression:

> The committee, through the weight of testimony, has learned that the major depressions have followed governmental action which directly resulted in the dislocation of money and through it of commodity values, or, in other words, in the destruction of profits from productive industry. Profits reduced when the general commodity price level is suddenly lowered by whatever cause and completely wiped out when the price level goes below the cost of production. The position of the United States has shifted as a result of the World War from a debtor to a creditor nation. As a result of this, the profit from our productive industry has assumed greater inportance as it establishes through investment as well as consumption the basis of a market for our manufactured products. The maintenance of a condition of prosperity in the United States is, therefore, accentuated to the point that the restoration of productive industry to a profit-earning basis is of transcendental importance. To convey this idea, in other words, we would say that the purchasing power of money must be brought back to normal, and, to do this, the causes of disequilibrium in money must be removed. Our investigation has revealed that certain European nations, in an effort to protect their manufacturing industries by affording a better cost basis through lower prices of raw materials and foodstuffs, suddenly, and either inadvertently and unintentionally or quite deliberately, depressed the world commodity price levels below the point that admits of any profit to the American producer. We find that this result has followed directly and definitely from certain governmental acts, the effects of which are clearly traceable so that all the important facts are well sustained by the evidence we have gathered.

That statement was made a long time before we did anything about it. I am not saying that the House did nothing. It did recognize rather early in 1932 that the purchasing power of money must be brought back to normal. Or to state it in another way, that the commodity price level must be raised, by its overwhelming vote on the Goldsborough bill in May or June of that year. Except for certain action on the part of our Federal Reserve authorities, nothing was done until President Roosevelt came into power, when he boldly proclaimed that the 1926 price level must be reestablished. I am in thorough accord with him in that objective, although I may disagree with him in the details of its accomplishment.

He recognizes the fact that the purchasing power of money must be brought back to normal, that gold has been rarified in value, that all other commodities and services have been depressed correspondingly in the other direction because gold is the yardstick of measure for values. I step in at that point and say here we have solved his problem. I say we have in this bill this remedy. We have worked out the solution. We can control gold and without foreign complications, and here in this bill is how we can do it. His treatment, so far as has been revealed, does not go to the extent of controlling gold or even of lowering the value of gold as a supreme world commodity that measures the value of all other commodities and services that are exchanged internationally between gold-standard countries.

And here is the crux of the whole problem. There is a difference in the interest of nations. Some nations, and the United States is a conspicuous example as such, produce more of the prime commodities than their domestic needs call for, as well as manufactured articles—and when I say prime commodities I mean foodstuffs and things that are to be processed by manufacture. Other nations are more in the nature of consumers of these products. All nations are in some degree producers of prime commodities, yet their consumptive abilities far outweigh their productive capacities, and their interest is to get as cheaply as possible the things needed for consumption. If this is so, and I do not think it will be disputed by anyone, then the interest of such nations is to strive for a level of prices that will give them advantage in the things that they have to buy.

And that being so, the European nations are always working for a lower price level for prime commodities and foodstuffs than we can afford to take and maintain the economic structure or the wealth structure of the United States. In this respect nations are no different than individuals; we all want to buy cheap the things we have not and need, and sell dear the things we have and do not need. The United States is or should be a great seller, and being a great seller it should protect its interest as a seller. In saying this, I say nothing disparaging of other nations who may be buyers; they will look out for themselves. And they should look out for themselves. I applaud them for looking well to the interests of their people as very evidently they do.

In my study of price levels with this committee and the study I have been able to make since, I find that the economic power in price levels is the greatest power the nations can contend for; and while I find European nations are active and alert to guard their interests in the matter of price levels, I also find with regret and, I might say, alarm, that we are "asleep at the switch." And, mind you, it is the duty of this Congress and all the Members of this Congress to guard against the actions and also against the force of organized propaganda which may be exercised by foreign nations who seek to reduce the price level so that they may buy the things that we produce more cheaply. It is to their interest so to do, and to the interest of the majority of their people. But it is to the interest of the vast majority of our people to protect world price levels from their manipulations.

If it is in our power—and I claim that it is—to protect ourselves as sellers, and if we do not do so then we have no one to blame but ourselves if our domestic economy is wrecked. We are attempting now to help ourselves as sellers, but in a negative way. We are limiting production to help our position as a seller; well, that is one way to do it. But somewhere in the world someone is needing that production, and if that is true, then the trouble is not the lack of need, but ability to satisfy the need. I realize needs must be reciprocal, otherwise there can be no satisfaction; but will anyone say that America has no needs?

I was told not so long ago that in a rather small community in my district—industrial in its nature—there were 500 persons without shoes to wear. The citizen of Turkestan is not the only one whose ribs are showing through. Limitation of production is not the permanent cure; restoring of profits to agriculture, industry, and commerce is the one and only permanent cure. And that brings me back to price levels; in order to have a profit you must have a price level above the cost of production, and I do not mean a domestic price level but a world price level, because the domestic price level is influenced if not determined by the world price level of things that we have to sell abroad. The committee found that the world price level was depressed, by certain nations "inadvertently and unintentionally or quite deliberately." What did the committee mean by that? It meant that something happened to the money of the world. Some of this money was rubbed out, so to speak, thereby placing a greater strain or duty upon the balance. How was that world money rubbed out? Silver is a part of the world's money system. Silver has in many places a money use equivalent to gold. I do not mean in governments alone but in thousands of corporations; and not in silver-standard countries alone, but also silver has a monetary use in certain gold-standard countries.

And I know that when I mention the word "silver" immediately there comes into the mind of many: Well, he is going to talk Bryanism, 16 to 1. So, to give you an idea as to just what I mean, let me express it in the language of one of the international bankers. This is a letter that he wrote to Senator BORAH in pamphlet form. I think probably all of the Members of this House have received a copy of this pamphlet. It is dated December 1, 1933:

> In my first draft of my letter of November 28 to you I had included a paragraph on silver. I subsequently took it out because I was afraid that the mere mention of silver in a proposal to modernize the gold standard would lead to an exaggerated stress being laid upon that feature of it. I agree with you that the stabilization in terms of gold of a metal that is used for money by more than half of the world's population is a most important element in achieving international monetary stability.

Silver is a part of the world's monetary system, as Mr. Warburg says, but he hates to mention it, and I have been given the devil many times for mentioning it. Permit me to say that I have no interest whatever in silver, and I do not know of any of my friends who have an interest in silver. The first time I ever saw a silver mine was last summer when I visited out in the State of Nevada with my good friend, Governor Scrugham. He showed me a silver mine, and I assure the Members of the House that I bought no stock in the mine and that I have no interest in any silver mine or in silver. I have not bought any silver on the stock exchange with the idea that it would go to 75 cents an ounce, where some people seem to want it to go, including our distinguished colleague from Maryland when he said this afternoon that if you put silver in at 75 cents an ounce it would be all right.

I am speaking of silver in an entirely different way. I am looking upon silver as a master key to the prosperity of gold-standard countries.

I was astonished when I awoke to the true understanding of silver. The importance of this understanding of silver to the Members of this Congress cannot be exaggerated. And the main criticism I have to the advocates of 16 to 1 silver coinage is that they are blocking the road. They are confusing the issue. They are proposing something that is so open to objection and so full of fallacies, if I may say so, that they are themselves obstructing silver legislation. Silver is the master key to depressions and an American plan for using silver as sound money will place that master key in the hands of this Nation. And 16 to 1 will not do it.

What is this relation to silver? After the war many of the European nations debased their silver coinage. And the British Government after hearing the report of the Hilton-Young Commission placed India upon a gold basis. This gave a source from which they collected and placed upon the market quite a large quantity of silver. France performed a similar operation in Indo-China. The sale of that silver had a definite effect upon the world's money base, an effect that is well known and well understood outside of the United States but an effect that is very little understood within the United States. It caused a strain upon gold that rarified its value and depressed all other commodities in the world. People all over Asia, as well, no doubt, as elsewhere, bought gold exchange and other gold equivalents, which forced pressure on gold, and then sold silver down from 65 cents per ounce to 25 cents per ounce, which rubbed out nearly 4 billion dollars of the world's money base in the form of silver values.

This naturally increases in the same proportion gold values, just as was predicted that it would, by no less an authority than Montagu Norman, of the Bank of England, when he was called before the Hilton-Young Commission in London in 1926.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman said that England put India on a gold basis.

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Was that a gold-exchange basis?

Mr. FIESINGER. It had been up to 1926 upon what is known as a "gold-exchange basis"; that is to say, its currency was based on British pounds that were in turn based upon gold, but there was one step of pyramiding there.

Mr. WHITE. In the operation of the gold-bullion basis, the Indian had to bring in $8,000 in gold to get redemption, did he not?

Mr. FIESINGER. I am not informed as to the exact details, whether it was $4,000 or $8,000. It took quite a large transaction for gold to be delivered for currency. But the point I am making is this. The change gave the Bank of India a basis for canceling the silver rupee notes and reissuing the new notes. This released the silver bullion, and when it was sold it destroyed billions of dollars' worth of values in the silver-money base of the world, and since silver and gold are interchangeable, or, as Montagu Norman puts it, since "there is an interaction between gold and silver", our banks got the pressure, our real-estate and security values, and we now know how that was passed down the line from one thing to another.

Mr. WHITE. When such redemption is made, it is a fact, is it not, that the Indian gets gold bullion and not gold coin?

Mr. FIESINGER. Exactly. I thought I said that they were on the gold-bullion basis. The point I wish to make is that it was the sale of the silver from 65 cents to 25 cents per ounce which put the corporations of Asia out of silver and into gold or gold equivalents. You cannot destroy a part of the money base without increasing the pressure on what is left. History has no other story to tell no matter how far back you may go.

The value of the world's money base can be protected just as it can be upset, and the purpose of this bill is to afford that protection.

If you will study this bill you will find that the struggle to corner, scramble for, and hoard gold would cease. The world commodity price level would rise under the control Congress has set in this bill, profits would ensue instead of losses. Banks would open their doors to productive enterprise, labor would be employed to reconstruct the world in the new era, the farms of America would again help to feed and clothe the world. Instead of going further in debt, the farmer could pay his debt from his profits.

The gold standard, which has gone "haywire", would be restored to a new and improved gold standard. It would be brand new, not the old gold standard of the international bankers, but the gold standard of the people. It would be a standard fair to consumers and producers, debtors and creditors, with a stable purchasing power for the dollar for a generation, as advocated by the President. It would eliminate the necessity of managed currencies issued by foreign banking institutions, such as the Bank of England. Or the necessity for a paper dollar tied by agreement to the English paper currency. It would put sound money issued by the United States in competition with foreign bank notes. We could stand this competition. We could regain our market with it.

Those who want our things will pay a fair price, and they will pay the price under this bill in terms of world wealth and not in terms of artificial currencies. Let me emphasize this point. Our markets will bring us more wealth, not more dollars of lesser value which will not increase the real value received.

We have a lot of talk about currency experimentation through silver. You would get the impression through sources that are half-informed that I would deal here with the currency; that this bill would inflate the currency; that this is silver inflation; or that it is currency inflation.

That is not the correct picture. I propose, in this bill, not to deal with currency at all, but to deal with the monetary base. I would not deal in experimentation with this money base. I would stop experimentation. I would protect the full-value monetary wealth of the world (gold and silver) from manipulation, and I would protect it by the guarantee that this bill gives that it will be held stable in value and that it cannot any longer be subjected to the kind of action reported to Congress by our committee. This bill puts the United States Government as a sentinel, to watch over, to guard, and to protect the money base from manipulation of the international bankers of Europe.

And I say to the Congress that, if Congress will give the world a sound and stable money base, it will then be possible for our Banking and Currency Committees to give us a sound and stable currency founded on this stable money base. The trouble with the world's national currencies is they have been built up upon a foundation of sand, due to the fluctuations of the purchasing power of the precious metals which constitute the world's money base. We need to restore to the world a sound and stable money base. This bill aims to do it. If it will not do it, I will be indeed thankful to any Member who will show me why not and in what respect it will not.

We can build up the silver base to take the pressure off of the gold base exactly as England and France have torn down the silver base and thereby increased the pressure on the gold base.

We are all familiar with the results of this thing. Now, let us study the causes and the remedy proposed in this bill to cure these causes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has referred to demonetization of silver in the Far East.

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that before demonetization took place it was a matter of conferences between the heads of the central banks of the world and the head of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and that, undoubtedly, Dr. Sprague sat in those conferences as the adviser of the head of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York?

Mr. FIESINGER. I have no information about that, but that would be fairly inferrable from the finding of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARK). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, many times have I addressed this House on the subject of agriculture and have always supported all legislation for bettering conditions of our farmers and working people. Do what you will, build as you may, but there can be no return to prosperity until agriculture is rehabilitated. With a prosperous agriculture there is no depression and everybody enjoys that prosperity to which they are entitled. Agriculture is our basic industry and the one upon which all other business depends. Farmers are the only people in this country who produce the necessities of life. Many of the comforts and luxuries we could live without, but we have to have things to eat and wear, and they are produced on the farm. When we assist agriculture we help all lines of business. Our farmers are the only business men who can continue to produce at less than cost. Farmers work as hard as ever, are honest and patriotic, and are entitled to a fair rate of profit upon the products of their toil. They have worked faithfully along with our other citizens for the success of our national recovery program.

I supported the Agricultural Adjustment Act in the last Congress, and believe much good has resulted from the operation of that measure, but also believe that additional supplemental legislation should be enacted in order to have complete recovery from this depression. January 15, 1932, I introduced H.R. 7797, known as the "Swank-Thomas cost of production bill", which is endorsed by the National Farmers' Union program and sponsored by that organization. This bill, as H.R. 3208, was also introduced in the first session of the present Congress, and I have introduced the same bill, with some modifications, in the present session, H.R. 6165. This bill provides that it is declared to be the policy of Congress to secure to farmers a price not less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit, of any agricultural product which is needed for domestic consumption. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to make public the part of the domestic production of any agricultural product needed for domestic consumption. The bill provides that such portion shall be sold at a price not less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. The surplus, if any, shall be exported, withheld from market, or otherwise disposed of, as directed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall license purchasers of agricultural products and provides that no person shall carry on any business specified in the announcement unless he has obtained a license. The bill makes it unlawful for any licensee to purchase that portion of any agricultural commodity needed for domestic consumption at a price less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit. The bill provides a penalty for violations of this provision. The bill permits an interchange or barter of agricultural commodities among producers or others for purposes of domestic consumption.

The Department of Agriculture states that the cost of producing cotton, wheat, corn, and oats for 1930, 1931, and 1932 is as follows:

	Cotton	Wheat	Corn	Oats
	Cents per pound	Per bushel	Cents per bushel	Cents per bushel
1930	16.0	$1.09	89	54
1932	9.0	.75	49	36

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe anyone will contend that the farmer is not entitled to the benefits provided in this bill. The measure does not provide that the farmer shall receive only cost of production but it provides that he shall not receive less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit. If the market price is more, the farmer would receive that price for his products.

Mr. Speaker, I have had much experience in agriculture and can figure cost of production. I believe any person who will take the time to figure this cost and include everything that the farmer puts in his crops will soon see that the figures on cost of production, as given by the Department of Agriculture, are too low. These figures do not include any profit. In January 1932 the National Farmers' Union, National Grange, and the American Farm Bureau Federation all endorsed this cost-of-production provision. These organizations understand the farm problem.

I wish to call the attention of the House to what is known as the "Frazier bill", H.R. 2855, introduced in the House by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE]. I filed a motion in the first session of this Congress, which motion is now on the Speaker's desk, to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from further consideration of the bill and to bring it before the House for consideration. This bill provides that farm indebtedness and mortgages now existing may be liquidated and refinanced through real-estate mortgages on the amortization plan at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum, and through mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes at 3 percent per annum, through the Federal farm loan system and the Federal Reserve banking system. The bill provides that the money shall be derived by the issuance of 1½-percent bonds which, if not sold, and they will not be sold at that rate of interest, will be presented by the Federal farm loan board to the Federal Reserve Board, as a basis for issuing Federal Reserve notes or paper money to loan direct to the farmers. I understand that the legislatures of 20 States have passed resolutions asking Congress to enact this bill. All Members of the House who believe that the Frazier bill would be of assistance in liquidating farm mortgages are respectfully asked to sign the motion and bring the bill before the House for consideration.

The National Farmers' Union, in convention in Omaha November 20, 21, 22, 1933, endorsed the Swank-Thomas bill, the Frazier bill, and the Wheeler bill, providing for the remonetization of silver. The legislative program of the National Grange says:

> Justice and the national interest alike demand that all arbitrary and artificial price boosting in industry must stop until farm prices are brought to an equality with industrial prices.

The Agriculture Adjustment Act, approved May 12, 1933, contained an amendment offered by Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, providing for the issuance of United States notes not to exceed $3,000,000,000. The amendment also gives the President power to reduce by proclamation the gold content of the gold dollar by as much as 50 percent, and personally I would like to see this provision put into effect, because we need a greater amount of money in actual circulation among our people. I believe that the remonetization of silver will be one of the greatest boons to agriculture and to recovery in general. This would greatly increase our export trade with foreign countries and therefore assist in bringing about better prices for agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, in times of depression agriculture is the first business hit and is usually the last to recover. This administration has gone further in granting relief to agriculture and on the question of inflation of our money system than any other administration, and has done more for the common people of our country. While we all have our individual views, we must remember that there is more than one road to town. I believe the President of the United States is doing his utmost to take our Government from the hands of the selfish interests and restore it to the people. None of these bills are perfect and they will doubtless need amendments. I believe the enactment into law of the Swank-Thomas bill, the Frazier bill, remonetization of silver, and the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, in connection with the acts now in force, will soon bring us to a complete recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have heard a lot of talk today about money in the hands of the people. Personally, I have not any, and that is one reason for the poverty I am in.

I am going to talk about several things that the House should be familiar with and know about. I am going to talk about imperialism in Latin America, not by Great Britain in India or Japan in China, but our own imperialism in Latin America that the people should be familiarized with.

But before I take up that subject, I want to call the attention of the House to what the United States of America has been doing with reference to the purchase of American-made goods. It may interest you to know that the biggest purchaser of foodstuff is the United States Panama Canal Commission, which supplies the Army and the Navy. It might interest you to know that the Panama Canal Commission is one of the biggest merchants in the world. It supplies the ships going in through the Canal, the great crossroads of the commerce of the world.

It may interest you to know that our Government has been selling Cuban beef to these ships that go through the Canal. Not only that, but we have been buying tons and tons of butter from New Zealand and Australia and selling it on the Panama Canal Zone. We have been buying livestock and selling the beef to the ships that pass through. Not only that, but there are 50,000 employees on the Canal Zone. There are in the neighborhood of 10 to 15 thousand soldiers and sailors there, and we are buying foreign goods and selling them to these people, soldiers, and sailors. I think you ought to know about it, I think the President should know about it, and I think the War Department and the State Department should know about it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that there is a law that prohibits that very thing?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I am familiar with it, but I want to say that the law is not obeyed.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The law prohibits that very thing and requires the purchase of American goods.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. But they are not doing it. When the international bankers were confronted with a critical situation in Cuba they went into Cuba and foreclosed on the beef cattle and sold them out—unloaded them on the United States Government. Not only that, but God, in His infinite wisdom, was kind enough to have one ship flounder and several thousand dollars worth of these goods went overboard.

Another thing that you ought to know about are the conditions that exist down there on the Canal Zone. They are conditions which ought not to exist.

Ladies and gentlemen, do you know that the United States of America has practically not one friend among the Panamanian people, a people whose friendship we should encourage, a people who in time of war would be our greatest asset, a people who should have the very greatest confidence in the United States of America. Yet as a people they have no confidence in the United States. I do not know whether you gentlemen know it, but for over 20 years the Panamanian Government has plead, has sought, has beseeched America under the treaty to allow the Panama Government to build a highway across the Isthmus of Panama, not on the Canal Zone, which is leased and operated by the United States of America, but upon their own property, and they have been refused that request. They have been denied that request. They have started work. They have even gone so far, in order to get some means of transportation, as to put in a barge line from Pedro Miguel Locks to Gatun Lock, to haul freight, and they were absolutely put off Lake Gatun and denied the right to use their own lake on their own property outside of the Canal Zone for commercial purposes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman tell us what jurisdiction the United States Government has to prohibit the Panamanians from building a road across the Isthmus outside the Canal Zone?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes; I can.

Mr. MOTT. What is it?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The arrogance of the Department down there that has told them they could not do it.

Mr. MOTT. What difference would it make if the Department did tell them so? I ask the gentleman what jurisdiction the United States Government has over the Panama Republic, so far as building that road is concerned.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Under a treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, Panama is forever kept from having an army or armed forces. They can have no more than a police force, and that must be limited to 1 man for every 30 inhabitants of an incorporated city, and the Panamanian people are not in a position to face the bayonets of the United States marines and build a road such as they want.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman has not answered my question. I asked him what jurisdiction the United States would have to prohibit the Panama Government from building a road across the Isthmus in the territory of the Panama Republic outside of the Canal Zone, and I ask the gentleman if he is stating to the House that the United States Government did prohibit the Panamanians from doing that?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. They did prohibit them from building the road, and I will tell you what authority they had. Under the old grant given to the Panama Railroad in the early days, before the days the French tried to dig the Canal, the Colombian Government granted that road, when it was built, the exclusive right to transfer freight and materials back and forth across the Isthmus. Under the old charter they are saying that if the Panamanians build a wagon road across the Isthmus of Panama it will take business away from the railroad company, which is owned by the United States Government. Does that answer the question?

Mr. MOTT. It does not. I am asking the gentleman how the United States Government can prohibit the Panamanians from building a highway across the Isthmus, not in the Canal Zone but in the territory of the Panama Government.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The same jurisdiction under which they stepped into Nicaragua and into Santo Domingo and Haiti and every other country in their imperialistic way and told those people of Latin America what they wanted and what they must do, for American capitalists.

Mr. MOTT. I don't think the gentleman has answered my question, and I am inclined to doubt whether the Government of the United States ever issued such an order or attempted to prohibit the building of such roads outside the Canal Zone.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I am authorized to say here this afternoon at the behest of several members of the Panamanian Cabinet, the President's Cabinet, that there lies earmarked in the Bank of Panama $1,000,000 which has been appropriated and set aside for the purpose of building a road from Gatun Lock to Madden Dam by the Government of Panama and that if that money is not put to use within the next 30 days another rainy season will be on and the people of Panama will be forced to use that money to feed their poor, and they have offered to the United States Government that they will build the road according to the surveys already made by the United States Army engineers and will give the United States Government full privilege and right to use that road any time for military or other activities in behalf of the United States of America.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman is talking about territory in the Canal Zone. Gatun Dam and Madden Dam are both in the Canal Zone. I am talking about a road across the Isthmus of Panama in the Republic of Panama.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. There are 24 miles left to be built that can be built, which is partly on Panama territory and partly on Canal Zone territory, which they offer to the United States Government, and have $1,000,000 appropriated to do it, but they have been refused the right to build that road.

Mr. MOTT. That refusal is a very different thing than the refusal to build a road across the Isthmus in Panamanian territory.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. They have also refused them to build a road across the Isthmus on their own territory and on their own lands, because of that old franchise given to the Panama Railroad Co. almost a hundred years ago.

Mr. MOTT. I think Congress would be very much interested in having the documentary evidence to that effect.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. That is why I am making this speech now, in the hope that they will get it.

The greatest landowner of the Republic of Panama is the United States Government. The United States Government owns the city of Colon, Panama. It receives rental from every foot of ground in that city, and the real estate thereon at the expiration of the leases reverts to the United States Government, or to the Panama Railroad Co., its subsidiary.

It might interest you to know that Panama has no land tax law, and the Senate of Panama refuses to tax its own citizenship a land tax on their farms and their agricultural pursuits so long as the greatest landowner in the Republic pays no taxes to the Panamanian Government. That is, the United States of America, which owns the city of Colon.

Not only that, but to show the arrogance that has been exercised on the Canal, the United States of America pumped the bottom out of the sea in Colon Harbor and built up a territory, on Panamanian soil, in the Canal Zone, known as "New Cristobal", when it had a strip of land 10 miles wide, beautiful locations for home sites for employees, and so forth. This shut off the view of the Panamanians who lived in Colon.

In addition to that, this Congress appropriated $720,000 to build a high school for the children of the employees in the Panama Canal Zone. United States Government officials in charge, took that $720,000 and built a high school upon the soil and territory of the Republic of Panama. When this school was completed, this is what happened: They put the American flag up on the high school. It made the Panamanians so irate that they organized a vigilante committee of patriotic Panamanians and they went and tore down the United States flag from the schoolhouse, which was built in the Republic of Panama, and in which the Republic of Panama children were denied the right to use the school.

In addition to that, it might interest you to know that the women of the Canal Zone have been putting up a terrible fight in Panama because of the moral conditions which exist there. It might interest you ladies and gentlemen to know that the United States of America is the owner of the land and is leasing blocks and blocks of land in the city of Colon, upon which brothels are built, and running openly in defiance of all moral law and human decency. The United States Government each month is collecting money and revenue from the sale of womanhood in the city of Colon.

Here is another thing that possibly some of you people do not know, and that is that the United States Federal law down on the Isthmus, in the Canal Zone, provides for an age of consent of 13 years. The age of consent down there is 13 years. It was only a short time ago that an officer, a policeman, a United States Government policeman, holding the same jurisdiction as a policeman in the District of Columbia, attacked a girl 13 years of age. He was about to be tried for rape, and I say to you that when the court came into session he proved the girl was 2 months over the age of 13, and so the charge of rape was dismissed, and a charge of adultery was brought in and a small fine was levied by the court.

It is almost time this Congress raised the age of consent above 13 years on United States Government property.

Here is another situation: We appropriated in this country, through our Recovery Act, between 6 and 7 million dollars for the purpose of eliminating some of the unemployment down in the Canal Zone. It might interest this Congress to know that from 85 to 95 percent of that money is being paid out to British subjects who are aliens, not citizens of the United States in any sense of the term. This money is being paid out to them, and practically the only Americans receiving any of this money are the supervisors and foremen in the construction of the projects down in the Canal Zone and the Army barracks and things supplementary thereto. These people are Jamaicans and Bahamians and citizens of Barbados, who are British subjects, brought over there, and therein lies another bone of contention so far as the United States and the Government of Panama is concerned. The United States Government has imported these Jamaican colored men to come in there from the day the Canal started, and also Martiniques. They have come there and they have worked for the United States Government. As soon as they are through with those employees they tell them, "We do not want you any more. You have to get off the Canal Zone." The outcome is that those people who no longer have work on the Canal Zone are forced out of the Canal Zone, and they flock into the cities of Colon and Cristobal, in the Republic of Panama, and they are a serious problem for the Republic of Panama, because they are then upon their charity lists.

They are not citizens of either the United States or of Panama; but the United States Government simply orders them outside of the Canal Zone, and the Panamanian authorities have them on their hands. Fifty percent of the inmates of the insane asylums of the Republic of Panama are Jamaicans and Barbadosians who worked on the Canal in the Canal Zone, but who are not citizens of Panama. They are thrown upon the Government of Panama for support after the United States of America has cast them out.

Panama has made an arrangement with the British Government whereby the British Government says to Panama, "If you will prove to us that the mother of such-and-such a child is of Jamaican descent or Barbadosian descent, we will let you send them back; but you must land them in Jamaica, in Kingston, or in Barbados with $10."

The Panamanian Government has asked the United States Government on several occasions for $150,000 to help their own government defray the expenses of sending these aliens to the countries where they belong so they will not be public charges, but they have been turned down on that repeatedly.

Now, this is the situation that exists, a situation which confronts the American people. While we talk about the action of Great Britain in India, or Japan in China, of the Belgians in the Congo, and various other national relationships, we are allowing to grow up and become established a condition, a situation, that actually exists in Central America which makes practically every nation on the face of the earth point the finger of shame toward us, and ask what right the United States has to talk about the suppression of inferior peoples, the sacred rights of smaller nations, and so forth, and so on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is how long will Congress allow this thing to exist?

I made a statement to the press upon my return from Panama several weeks ago, and immediately the War Department and the State Department came out with a denial, saying that the Panamanians could build a road across that Isthmus if they wished. I challenge right now either the War Department or the State Department to make that a public, official statement, signed by their officials, and send it to the President of Panama. If they will do so, I can assure them this road will be started within the next 10 days, will be under construction, and Panama will be able to put its unemployed citizens to work and spread out that $1,000,000 entirely to the benefit of Panamanians and use it toward opening a vast territory which is now absolutely untapped so far as means of transportation are concerned. It will put this money to constructive work; and the United States of America and its armed forces, whether in time of war or in time of peace, will have full use of this highway from coast to coast.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. For a question; yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is the gentleman in favor of allowing foreign countries to build highways running into and across the Panama Canal, highways which can as easily be used to transport foreign cannon or other war-making devices as automobiles, and used against our interests?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. If that road were built, it would be, from a defense standpoint, one of our greatest assets, as has been testified to by members of the United States Army Engineers.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Could it not be used just as easily as a means of offense?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. They have got to get it first. Our Army is there on the ground however. The Panamanians want this road and are ready to start its construction.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. But the gentleman just said they were all against us.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Just a minute. I should like to make that offer——

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. That we are going to let them build that road?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes; and show toward that people some little, decent courtesies instead of stepping on their necks.

I may say that several years ago a so-called "treaty" was prepared and handed to the Panamanian Senate with the thought they were going to railroad it through, but a Panamanian senator, Hermondo Arias, now President of the Republic of Panama, was the sole individual who stood up on the floor of the Senate of Panama and defeated that treaty. Furthermore, I may say that that treaty so embittered the Panamanians toward the United States Government, because it included a provision that in case of war the United States Government should have the power to draft and induct any Panamanian into the United States Army in defense of the Panama Canal—this engendered such hatred against the American people that the Panama Government upon six occasions has tried to take a census of their republic, but the people are so afraid of the taking of a census that when the Government sends anyone with census papers to fill in the Panamanians absolutely will not say a word or answer a question for fear that if they sign their names to that or give such information they are to be inducted into the United States military forces.

This is the condition that exists down there. I say it is wrong. I am calling it to the attention of this House because I feel the Members want to know about it, and I feel that something should be done about it. Here is a great people, the Panamanian people. I know them. I have been down there. I helped dig that little ditch called the Panama Canal. I worked down there. I rubbed elbows with these people, and I know they are fine people. I know if they were given any kind of consideration at all as being humans, you might say, we could develop a friendship and build a cooperation and coordination with the Government and the Army, which we are going to need eventually, because there are very important strategical points in the Panama Canal, in Gatum Dam, in the Panama Railroad, and various other places, where one bomb would put the railroad or the canal out of business for transporting our Army or Navy back and forth across this isthmus. Just one bomb exploded on that railroad where it goes through Gatun Lake for miles and miles on a narrow roadbed would absolutely cripple the canal. So I say that the biggest thing the United States could have would be a road across Panama over which they could transport their equipment and supplies, and so forth, in defense of our interests in that canal.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Was it to Gatun Lake they wanted to run this highway of which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. And the gentleman says one bomb thrown over into the lake would wreck the whole Panama Canal?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Absolutely, so far as the transportation system is concerned.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. What is to hinder an enemy from traveling this road in a high-powered car and dropping a bomb from the car?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The road would be controlled. Does the gentleman know anything of the topography of that country?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I was not down there this summer.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. That is why the gentleman asked the question.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I would like to know if it is not true that were such a highway built an enemy of the Government could drive over it in one of these 90-mile-an-hour automobiles and drop a bomb over the side of the car?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I want the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] to know that the lay of the country down there makes it impossible to build a road anywhere along that canal that is not 4 or 5 miles back from Gatun Lake or back from the railroad. This happens to be true because of the topography of the country. They are not going to build any road right along the edge of the canal, because that would be impossible, and that would be just as dangerous with respect to being blown up as the present railroad or the dam or one of the locks.

It may also interest you to know that at one point there is a grade built across a ravine to hold the water in Gatun Lake, and this holds the lake level up to 87½ feet, and several years ago a British syndicate came in there under the ruse of a mining concession and received a concession from the Panama Government, and they now hold possession of that piece of land where just one little bomb would empty Gatun Lake and put its waters into the Atlantic Ocean in less time than you could tell about it.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this is going to be a north and south road?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. It is going to be a road across the Isthmus; yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. A north and south road?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes; the canal runs north and south.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the road is 5 miles away, how is it going to cross the canal?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The road will run parallel and not cross the canal.

That is by reason of the way the mountains zigzag over into the 10-mile zone.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. It is going to be a north-and-south road and never strike the Panama Canal?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes; and I want to inform the gentleman from Kentucky that never in the history of the relations between the United States and Panama has the Panama Government ever refused to grant one request of the United States.

At the present time the United States of America is building a large dam and reservoir, called "Madden Dam" in the Chagres River, which is on Panama territory. A road has been built from Panama City to this dam to aid in its construction, and the road is built mostly upon land belonging to the Republic of Panama, and I think we might very well go as far as the Republic of Panama in at least being halfway decent and halfway civilized.

It might also interest Congress to know that every nation in the world is permitted to ship goods through the Panama Canal except Panama. The United States Government will not allow a Panamanian ship loaded at David on the west coast of Panama to go through the canal and deliver its cargo to Porto Bello on the east coast. Intercoastal traffic has been blocked entirely. How long shall we continue to discriminate against a small nation in this manner? How long will Congress tolerate these conditions? How long will we continue to furnish evidence of imperialism on our own part to be used by other nations against us? These are important issues that must be met by the American Congress some day. Let us clear up these injustices right now, so we will not be compelled to bow our heads in shame before the finger of accusation at the hands of other nations. Let us act now. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have just had an opportunity to read—rather hurriedly, I admit—an advance copy of the annual report of the Postmaster General. While this was a confidential advance copy, nevertheless it is subject to release today. Therefore in referring to it I am not violating the release provisions.

I note with a great deal of interest that the Postmaster General makes a recommendation for additional legislation which will subject persons robbing, or attempting to rob, custodians of Government funds to the same penalties now provided for attacks upon the mails. I agree that such legislation is necessary, and will introduce the bill he suggests. The fact that there has been an increase of almost 600 percent upon the units of the Postal Service which handle Government moneys justifies this recommendation. These attacks in the main are instigated by gangsters who, of course, are not employees of the Postal Service.

I am rather astonished, however, to fail to find any recommendation in the report to curb the racket of fourth-class postmasters who have been robbing the Government for a good many years.

There are 33,000 fourth-class postmasters in this country. The great majority of these men and women are honest public officials, obeying the law and regulations to the letter, but there are thousands who, by the use of petty methods, have robbed the Government.

Shortly after the present Postmaster General assumed office I called his attention to these nefarious practices. I had several conferences with the officials and finally succeeded in getting an investigation started, which I hope has resulted in a discontinuance of the practices of which I complained.

The fourth-class office is an expensive one to the Postal Service, and assists materially in enlarging the deficit which the Postmaster General refers to in his report. This is because Congress has not for over 50 years changed the method of paying the fourth-class postmaster. Under existing conditions the fourth-class postmaster is paid upon the basis of cancellations of stamps at his office, plus money he receives for rent of boxes, issuing money orders, and so forth. The Department officials themselves are responsible for the statement that for every $100 in stamps canceled at fourth-class offices it costs the Government $140 in salary. On top of this be it remembered the Government must also pay to carry the mail to its destination.

In other words, during the last fiscal year according to figures I received from the Department, $19,450,000 was paid to fourth-class postmasters, and the total cancelation of stamps was $10,500,000. Here we paid nearly $9,000,000 above the amount of stamps sold for the privilege of delivering at additional cost $10,500,000 in mail matter. Several thousand rural postmasters engaged in these "rackets" I complained of were investigated by postal inspectors.

The irregularities charged to the postmasters whose records were scrutinized include such practices as sending heavy packages of merchandise and even bricks and boards by parcel post as a means of increasing their income from cancelations of stamps. Before the investigation is completed it is expected that many prosecutions and a large number of dismissals will result. This investigation has been under way in all sections of the country for the last several months. It is also expected many fourth-class offices will be discontinued and other arrangements made for handling mail.

Fourth-class postmasters, most of whom are in small villages, receive 160 percent on the first $75 of postage they cancel, 85 percent on the next $100, and 75 percent on all in excess of $175. To this compensation are added the rental of post-office boxes, and an allowance of 15 percent for rent, light, fuel, and equipment. They also receive a commission of 3 cents each on all the money orders they issue.

This method of compensating these rural postmasters prompts them to use various devices to increase cancelations. As I said, the more stamps they cancel, the greater their gains.

Inspectors assigned to the investigation by Postmaster General Farley reported that postmasters invented many schemes by which to swell their fees for cancelations.

With this purpose some of them have mailed bricks, gravel, oyster shells, milk, cream, walnuts, and other bulky but worthless articles. In general these packages were sent by parcel post to relatives of the postmasters. One postmaster wrote notes on pieces of board and sent them to a member of his family. Others who conducted stores sell groceries to their relatives and friends in other localities and by affixing sufficient postage on the bags and boxes insured their delivery by the rural carrier in his neighborhood. He not only received profit on his sales but also received from the Government the amount of stamps placed on the packages, plus the usual percent.

So eager are some postmasters to enlarge their commissions that they put stamps on the letters they write to the Post Office Department, although franked envelops are supplied to them for use in official correspondence. Why? Because they receive the amount of postage used.

I began my inquiry many months ago, after my attention had been directed to some of the sort of abuses I have described. Within 1 week I found that about 200 postmasters in Missouri and Illinois were shipping eggs to St. Louis by parcel post. These shipments comprised from 2 to 30 cases. In some instances postmasters sent cases of eggs by parcel post from Missouri to New York City. The charge for postage on these eggs was about $3. They could have been shipped by express for half that amount and by freight at still less cost. It cost the postmaster nothing to ship to New York, but on the contrary he received the amount of stamps used.

If a postmaster were to ship enough eggs by parcel post to require $75 in postage, he would not only not lose by the transaction but would instead receive back the full amount he paid for stamps and $45 besides.

I presented to Mr. Farley and Mr. Joseph C. O'Mahoney, former First Assistant Postmaster General, the facts I gathered. They at once instituted a Nation-wide investigation. This inquiry has already corrected abuses in many places and will undoubtedly in the end result in a discontinuance of such practices. Mr. Farley and Mr. O'Mahoney had an opportunity to see the nature and the extent of this racket. For instance, they found that postmasters in Kentucky and West Virginia were using the parcel post to transport cases of eggs from their communities to Washington, Baltimore, and New York. The mail charges averaged $1.50 or more a case and were naturally very much higher than would have been the expense of shipping them by express. The principal purpose in mailing them at all was to benefit the postmaster in dollars and cents while the Government took the burden. Is there any wonder we have a postal deficit?

There were 33,528 fourth-class postmasters on July 1 this year.

In an attempt to secure definite information as to the volume of business and the amount paid fourth-class postmasters I called for statistics from the Post Office Department. I quote from one report. This is on the fiscal year ended July 1, 1933:

> To sum up the situation, we estimate that the total payments at fourth-class offices for all purposes, including compensation to postmasters, mail-messenger service, special-delivery fees, and separating mail allowance, was a total of $19,450,000, and these payments were made on total cancelations estimated to have been $10,500,000.

Phrased otherwise, the Government spent all the revenue it derived from these post offices and nearly nine millions besides to pay the postmasters. Over and above this outlay for handling the mail at these rural offices, the Government was compelled to assume the cost of carrying it to and from them.

It is time to change the law fixing the pay of these fourth-class postmasters. They should receive salaries graduated in amount to correspond with the volume of business they handle. These fourth-class post offices should in many cases be abolished, and what is known as " rural stations " should be substituted for them. Proprietors of stores in small communities are eager to serve as postmasters. They know that many persons who visit the post office are also potential buyers of merchandise from the store.

Revision of the pay of such postmasters and correction of the questionable practices of many of them would undoubtedly prevent or greatly reduce the loss at present incurred by the Government in handling of mail in the fourth-class offices.

I need hardly repeat that the large majority of postmasters of whatever grade are honest and faithful public servants. The records of the past and the developments in the investigation now in progress emphasize this fact. But the system is defective and grossly expensive, and should be abandoned. It happens also to be a grave temptation to many men and women who administer it in the fourth-class post offices. The Postmaster General's investigation, when complete, will unquestionably reveal the necessity for a quick and thorough reformation.

For many years prior to 1877 the fourth-class postmasters were paid in proportion to the stamps they sold. In order to increase their earnings many postmasters disposed of stamps at a discount in large cities, knowing that they would be fully reimbursed in the higher pay they would receive in consequence of heavier sales. The report of the Third Assistant Postmaster General in 1878 exposed this malfeasance and the law was changed.

The taxpayer cannot be expected to remain silent when he knows that postmasters have shipped by parcel post bundles of ordinary kindling wood costing in some instances 40 cents to mail when the wood disposed of sells for 5 or 10 cents when it reaches its destination.

It is hard for one to conceive that a postmaster would ship oyster shells, bricks, produce of every kind, especially perishable vegetables, by parcel post, paying postage far in excess of the value of the shipment, but the investigation of the post-office inspectors discloses this to be a fact.

While I was talking with a post-office official about this matter a letter was brought to his desk. It was an official letter from a fourth-class postmaster, who had placed a stamp over the frank which would have carried the letter without postage. The official informed me that some of them even register an ordinary letter. Postmaster General Farley has inherited this situation, and I am sure he is going to cure it. From my conversation with post-office officials I was convinced that an honest return from a fourth-class postmaster should always be below the amount of stamps actually sold at the station, but it was disclosed that the report of cancelation generally equals the sales and in some instances exceed the sales.

Last September the Postmaster General referred briefly to this matter in a speech before a postmasters' convention at Rochester. He said then that legislation would be recommended to curb the evil; but as it does not appear in his annual report, I will request that the necessary legislation be submitted to me so I can introduce the bill. I propose to prepare an amendment in the form of a limitation to be offered when the appropriation bill is before the House which will prevent the use of any money appropriated for the payment of salaries to fourth-class postmasters who send through the mail any matter that they would not send if they were not holding the position of postmaster. [Applause.]

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

NINTH PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 19 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands", I transmit herewith a set of the laws and resolutions enacted by the Ninth Philippine Legislature during its second special session, January 16–31, 1933.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF PUERTO RICO

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 12 of the act of Congress of March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes", I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the Thirty-third Annual Report of the Governor of Puerto Rico for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933.

This report contains valuable information which it is believed should be available in permanent form. It has heretofore been customary for the President to recommend to the Congress the printing of the annual report of the Governor of Puerto Rico, the cost of such printing being charged against War Department appropriations. In the present case, however, due to special conditions not ordinarily obtaining, the Government of Puerto Rico has arranged to make available to the War Department a number of printed copies of the enclosed report, sufficient to meet the minimum needs of the Federal executive departments and also to supply a limited number of copies for the requirements of the Congress. In view of these facts and of the urgent need of effecting exceptional economies at this time, the customary recommendation for the printing of the annual report of the Governor of Puerto Rico is omitted.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We praise Thee, gracious God, for Thy goodness and mercy are as fresh and new as the breath of the early morning! Continue the golden breezes to blow tenderly from the slopes of the upper hills. Our hopes, our yearning spirits, our unspoken prayers, and our quivering silence look up to Thee. We own our weakness and our failures. As we come, make the rapture and peace of soul real and let us find Thy yoke easy and burden light. Almighty God, the great drama of our country's life rolls on. Let come out of heaven a hand clearing, pointing, and inspiring the way, lifting our whole national being to the highest level of brotherly cooperation. Hear us, blessed Lord; fill all lives with a nobly sustaining gladness and all breasts with a trustful patriotic song. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LIQUOR BILL

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER] and one half by myself, and that general debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the unanimous consent that was granted for taking up this bill provided that it should be taken up under the general rules of the House. I have no disposition in any way to delay the consideration of the bill. I do, however, want 10 minutes in which to discuss the bill. My position against all such bills is well known to my colleagues, and with the assurance of the good lady of New Jersey that I shall be given that time, I shall not object.

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman the 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I have no objection to the request to thus limit debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey that the general debate be limited to 2 hours, one half of the time to be occupied by her and the other half by the gentleman from New York, and that debate be confined to the bill?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mrs. NORTON was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill H.R. 6181, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which this bill was referred, held joint hearings with the Senate committee on the bill and invited the citizens of the District to present their views.

After careful consideration of all the facts presented, your committee has prepared a bill which it considers a very good one to control the sale of beverages in the District of Columbia.

The desire of your committee is to pass a law which will return a fair amount of revenue to the District and at the same time safeguard the interests of the people as well as the property interests within the District.

It also is the desire of the committee to discourage the use of hard liquor by remitting the tax on light wines and beer and in this manner serve the cause of temperance.

The purpose of this bill is to permit the sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia under a licensing system. It is therefore necessary to repeal the National Prohibition Act and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof insofar as they affect the District of Columbia, which is accomplished in section 1 of this bill, with the exception of section 4 of the National Prohibition Act insofar as it affects denatured alcohol and title III of said act, relating to industrial alcohol.

Section 2 of the bill limits its operation to the District of Columbia and prohibits delivery of alcoholic beverages outside the District of Columbia in violation of the law of the place of delivery.

Section 3 contains definitions. The most important definitions are those relating to clubs, hotels, and restaurants, these definitions being intended to preclude the issuance of licenses to hotels, restaurants, and clubs which are not bona fide establishments.

Section 4 of the bill provides for the appointment of an alcoholic beverage control board by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Said board is to consist of three persons, at least one of whom shall be a woman and all of whom must be residents of the District of Columbia for at least 3 years immediately preceding his appointment. The salary of each of the members of the board is fixed at $6,000 per annum. The terms of the members are to be for 4 years, the persons first appointed for 2, 3, and 4 years, respectively. This section also provides for the employment of other personnel and the payment of expenses of the board. The members of the board may be removed by the Commissioners only for cause and after service of written charges and an opportunity to be heard thereon.

Section 5 prohibits any member or employee of the board from having any interest in the liquor business.

Section 6 gives the board full power to issue, transfer, and revoke all licenses, with an appeal to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the case of a revocation of a license.

Section 7 confers upon the Commissioners broad powers to control and regulate the business of selling alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and for the issuance, transfer, and revocation of licenses.

Section 8 exempts from the operation of the act preparations manufactured for nonbeverage purposes.

Section 9 prohibits the manufacture, sale, or solicitation for sale of alcoholic beverages without a license so to do.

Section 10 provides for the issuance of licenses to individuals, partnerships, or corporations, but not to unincorporated associations.

Section 11 provides for 11 kinds of licenses:

(a) Manufacturer's license, class A, to operate a rectifying plant, a distillery, or a winery. The annual fee for the rectifying plant is fixed at $2,000, for the distillery at $2,000, and for the winery at $500; provided that if a distillery is licensed for the manufacture of alcohol and more than 50 percent of such alcohol is sold for nonbeverage purposes, the annual fee shall be $1,000.

(b) Manufacturer's license, class B, to operate a brewery. The annual fee for such license is fixed at $2,500.

(c) Wholesaler's license, class A, for the sale of all alcoholic beverages to other licensees for resale and for the sale of beer and light wines to consumers. Such a licensee, except a wholesale druggist or wholesale grocer, is prohibited from engaging in other business on the premises except the sale of alcoholic and nonalcoholic beverages. The annual fee for this license is fixed at $1,500.

(d) Wholesaler's license, class B, to sell beer and light wines to other licensees for resale and to consumers. The annual fee for such license is fixed at $750.

(e) Retailer's license, class A, to sell all alcoholic beverages to consumers for consumption off the premises. The annual fee for such license is fixed at $750.

(f) Retailer's license, class B, for the sale of beer and light wines to consumers for consumption off the premises. The annual fee for such license is fixed at $100.

(g) Retailer's license, class C, issued to bona fide restaurants, hotels, or clubs or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals for the sale of spirits, wine, and beer for consumption only on the premises. Spirits and wines, except light wines, may be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables, and beer and light wines may be sold and served only to persons seated at public tables or bona fide lunch counters, except that spirits, wine, and beer may be served in a private room if such room has been approved by the board. In the case of hotels and clubs, beverages may also be served in the private rooms of guests. The annual license fee for a restaurant is $500; for a hotel under 100 rooms, $500; for a hotel of 100 or more rooms, $1,000; for a club, $250; for a marine vessel, $50 per month or $500 per annum.

(h) Retailer's license, class D, to be issued to bona fide restaurants, taverns, hotels, clubs, or passenger-carrying marine vessels to sell beer for consumption on the premises. The annual license fee is fixed at $200.

(i) Retailer's license, class E, to be issued to a druggist to sell alcoholic beverages on prescription of a physician. The annual license fee is fixed at $25.

(j) Retailer's license, class F, to be issued to sell beer and light wines temporarily at banquets, picnics, and similar public gatherings. The fee for such license is fixed at $5 per day.

(k) Solicitor's license, to authorize an individual to represent the holder of a manufacturer's or wholesaler's license. The annual fee for this license is fixed at $2.

Section 12: This section prohibits an "on sale" and an "off sale" license being issued for the same premises and prohibits any retail licensee from holding more than one license.

Section 13 contains certain details relative to the licenses and the license year.

Section 14 sets forth the investigation of licensees. In paragraph (c) of this section there is a limitation upon the granting of licenses where the owners of a majority of the property within a radius of 600 feet of the premises for which the license is requested object to the granting of such license.

Section 15 forbids the issuing of licenses in certain-use districts as defined in zoning regulations.

Section 16 provides for the transfer of licenses, for which a fee of $25 is fixed.

Section 17 provides for revocation of license for violation of any provision of the act and for certain other causes.

Section 18 prohibits any manufacturer of beverages from having any interest in any wholesale or retail business.

Section 19 contains similar restrictions prohibiting a wholesaler of beverages from having any interest in a retail business.

Section 20 contains limitations upon the sales to minors or intoxicated persons.

Section 21 provides that if any licensee shall become bail for any person charged with a violation of the act, his license shall be revoked.

Section 22 provides for reports by licensees for the purpose of collecting taxes.

Section 23 provides for a tax of 50 cents on every wine gallon of wine containing more than 14 percent of alcohol by volume, and on champagne or any wine artificially carbonated a tax of 20 cents on every gallon of wine containing 14 percent or less of alcohol; a tax of 50 cents on every wine gallon of spirits, and a tax of $1.10 on every wine gallon of alcohol.

Section 24 requires a report by the licensee of beverages purchased outside the District of Columbia.

Section 25 places a limitation upon the persons who may be employed by a licensee in the distribution of alcoholic beverages.

Section 26 provides for the giving of testimony before the board.

Section 27 adopts substantially the provision of existing law prohibiting one from driving a locomotive, etc., while intoxicated.

In paragraph (c) of this section the traffic act relating to the driving of motor vehicles while intoxicated is retained in force.

Section 28 prohibits drinking in public places.

Section 29 contains the usual provision relating to search warrants.

Section 30 provides a penalty for a minor falsely representing his age for the purpose of procuring alcoholic beverages.

Section 31 provides for disposal of existing permits to sell 3.2 beer under the act approved April 5, 1933.

Section 32 permits druggists to sell, upon prescription without a license, pending the issuance of license under this act.

Section 33 provides a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for any violation of the act for which no specific penalty is provided.

Section 34 repeals certain inconsistent laws relating to the District of Columbia.

Section 35 prohibits the sale of beverages on credit, with the exception of beer and light wines.

Section 36 requires rectified or blended spirits to bear a label showing the nature of such spirits.

Section 37 is the usual saving clause in the event any provision of this act should be held invalid.

I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if resort to parliamentary rules could stop the passage of this bill, it would not be passed. If any Member here could stop it, I would stop it.

I am not in favor of filling the Nation's Capital, the District of Columbia, with liquor saloons from one side of it to the other. Under this bill, there will be hundreds of whisky saloons all over Washington. This bill prevents bars and brass rails, but the places where this hard liquor will be sold will, nevertheless, be saloons. You will find again hundreds of oldtime saloons existing here in Washington.

This bill ought not to be passed. In my humble opinion it is a disgrace to the Nation's Capital, but there is no way on earth to stop its passage here today. Those who believe in raising the youth of the land up in temperance are going to have to start all over again from the very foundation and build up. It is not something that can be done in a year or in 10 years. It is something that, to be done right, will take years and years to accomplish. We are going to have to educate the new generation over again on this subject.

We are going to have to teach the boys and girls of America in the schools that in the railroad business no railroad man can drink and hold his job. We are going to have to teach the youth of this land that when they apply to banking institutions in this country for jobs they must show a clean record that they do not drink. We are going to have to teach the children in the schools that if they expect to hold jobs of importance with the leading business men of this Nation, they must stay away from strong drink. The politicians will learn again in time to come that when they ask the electorate to go into the solemn booth and cast their ballots for them, they are going to have to assure the electorate that they are sober men, that they abstain from strong drink, that they do not attend saloons, if you please. That time is not here now, but it will come again, surely in the next 20 years. Therefore, just now, Mr. Chairman, when we cannot stop its passage, I do not butt my head against a stone wall in an effort to defeat a bill when nothing by such effort could be accomplished.

What is there about this bill from an economic standpoint that ought to appeal to every Member of this Congress to oppose it? Why should you create a board here of three members, a liquor board, and pay them salaries of $6,000 each per annum? In my State, the great State of Texas, the circuit judges, if you please, who try men for their lives, who try cases daily involving millions of dollars of property right, who pass upon the domestic rights of families, get $4,000 a year, and in the last 2 years the legislature has decreased the salaries of these circuit judges from $5,000 to $4,000 a year. The people demanded such decreases. Appeal judges in my State, the judges on the courts of appeal, do not now get $6,000 per year. Why should you pay these three members of a liquor board here $6,000 a year each? Why do you not put a limitation in this bill that will pay them not more than $3,000 and that will stop the payment of salaries above $6,000 to some of the employees of the board? When you say that the salaries of their employees shall be fixed by the Classification Act of 1923, you provide the possibility that some ordinary clerks working for this $6,000 board will be called "directors" or "superintendents" or "chiefs" of this or that, and who under the Classification Act of 1923 are going to receive 6, 7, 8, and 9 thousand dollars per year.

Now is the time to stop provisions like that; now is the time to amend provisions in a bill like that. I have made so many efforts to stop these increases that it almost seems futile. We go along and let committees bring in these bills that are prepared by bureau chiefs who look out for their own, who write the language in there that takes care of their own salaries and emoluments, and the country does not know that this Congress by the act of 1923 gave up the power and control over the salaries of employees of this Government and turned that over to the employees themselves. The people do not know that, but it is the truth.

Seventy-nine thousand employees of this Government live in Washington—most of them splendid men and women from the 48 States of the Nation. Some of them are 3,000 miles away from home. Some of them are young women, some of them are young men—daughters and sons of good mothers back home who are looking to us to surround them with proper environment here in the Nation's Capital, and yet we are going to put a saloon around the corner from every one of them. Can you answer that when you go back home?

They say that there are 11 kinds of licenses in this bill, and there are. There are 2 kinds of manufacturing licenses, 3 kinds of wholesale licenses, and there are plenty of retail licenses in the bill. Some of them permit only beer and wine to be sold, and you cannot sell it to anyone under 18 years of age. Let me quote just a few excerpts from the bill:

"Table" shall not include a counter, bar, or similar contrivance.

The salary of each of the members of the board shall be $6,000 per annum. The Commissioners are authorized to employ such other personal services, including three additional assistant corporation counsels, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and to provide for the expenses of the board. The salaries of employees, other than members of the board, shall be fixed in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

* * * Licenses issued hereunder shall not authorize the sale or delivery of beverages, with the exception of beer and light wines, to any person under the age of 21 years, or beer or light wines, to any person under the age of 18 years * * *.

No person shall be intoxicated while in charge of or operating any locomotive or while acting as a conductor or brakeman of a car or train of cars, or while in charge of operating any street car, elevator, water craft, or horse-drawn vehicle in the District of Columbia.

* * * said spirits shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, always to my good friend the distinguished jurist from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Does this bill repeal the provision in the Democratic platform which declared against the open saloon? There is a little provision here which says that they shall not have a bar and a brass rail.

Mr. BLANTON. No bars and no brass rails, but "saloons" they are just the same.

Mr. PATMAN. They must sit down.

Mr. BLACK. They have to sit on the brass rail.

Mr. BLANTON. They have to sit on the brass rail, if they have a brass rail, while they drink. To be convivial and social they must sit down to it.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. John and the rest of us used to like to be convivial standing up as well as sitting down.

Mr. McCORMACK. I prefer to stand up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas 3 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. May I suggest that the only difference between the saloon under this bill and the saloon under the old system is that in order to be served a drink in one of the new saloons you must sit down at a table? But if you wish to be served with high wines and beer you can be served at a counter, but you must be sitting and you may put your feet on the brass rail.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; that is the legal distinction between this saloon tweedledum and tweedledee. [Laughter.]

Now, there are licenses in this bill that will permit you to buy it standing up. A young boy or a young girl, if 18 years old, can buy beer and wine, and just as soon as they reach 21 they can go to some of these special saloons and buy package goods by the case and take it home, around the corner, and debauch all night if they want to.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. How did they do it under prohibition, with the speak-easy?

Mr. BLANTON. Doctor, you are one of the strong advocates of strong drink in the Nation who does not drink himself, who speaks regularly from this floor for strong drink. I do not see how in the world a man who does not drink himself wants to put this stuff down the guzzle of somebody else. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the proposed bill is perhaps as good a license bill as could be drafted, but due to the fact that the eighteenth amendment has been repealed on account of the promises made by both party platforms, and oft repeated by the President of the United States that the saloon would not return, it seems to me that any license system whereby intoxicating liquors are permitted to be sold by the drink does return the saloon and will be so considered by a large majority of our people.

At this particular time there is another outstanding feature, namely, the poor quality of liquor to be put on the American market on account of the fact that we have practically no aged liquor in stock, and the distillery and rectifying interests have so manipulated, by securing nearly all of the licenses for importation of foreign liquors that they will be able, to a large extent, to prevent the uncut foreign liquors from reaching our markets. On account of the unstandardized quality of the liquor that will be sold by the drink in an unusually large number of licensed places in the District of Columbia, we can look for an excessive amount of intoxication by its unrestricted use, and I believe the only safeguard is to have a dispensary system so rigidly controlled that no hard liquors can reach the consumer except through stores controlled by the liquor board, and a provision should be written into this bill prohibiting any liquor to be sold until it has passed a chemical test by the board of chemists. Under such a plan liquor can be sold in package form for consumption in the homes so much cheaper than it can be sold by private parties that it will go a long way toward eliminating the bootlegger and the speakeasy. At the same time, the Government can derive more revenue from it, and the profits that would otherwise go to the wholesaler and retailer will be reflected in the lower price of liquor to the consumer.

I do not believe any license system can be drafted that will successfully prevent the retail dealer from selling bootleg liquor in place of tax-paid liquor. Therefore, the revenue that would be derived through any licensing system would be very small indeed.

I am opposed to this bill because it provides for the return of the oldtime saloon. It repudiates the platforms of both of the major parties. Even the so-called "wet organizations" are opposed to this bill in its present form. Dr. F. W. Buck, chairman of the joint elective legislative committee of 12 antiprohibition organizations, stated that in his opinion the enactment of this bill would lead to a reaction against the liberalization of the liquor laws and result in prohibitory laws being reenacted within a very few years.

This bill should be recommitted to the District of Columbia Committee, with the recommendation that a dispensary system be substituted.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN.

SO-CALLED "MODEL LIQUOR BILL"

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, in considering this bill Members of Congress sit as a State legislature to pass upon this legislation. This bill has been referred to as a model bill, which will be considered by all the 48 States of the Nation when they are considering legislation for the sale of intoxicating beverages in those States.

It was said before the committee that the reason we should be careful with this legislation is because it will be pointed to as a model bill, and further that many Members of Congress desire to be very careful about the kind of bill they vote for the first opportunity they have to vote on this question after the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OF 1932

The Democratic platform of 1932 contains this provision as a recommendation to the States after repeal, and, of course, the District of Columbia is in the same category as a State. That platform provides this:

We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open, under complete supervision and control by the States.

Now, let us not overlook those three points. The first is a bill that will actually promote temperance; second, one that will effectively—do not overlook that word "effectively"—one that will effectively prevent the return of the saloon; third, one that will bring the liquor traffic out into the open.

VIOLATION OF DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

Now, let us examine this bill that is before the House and see if it comes within the requirements of the Democratic platform—and the Republican platform was equally as rigid. This bill gives the hotels and restaurants a monopoly. The hotels are especially favored.

Let us see what the practical effect of this bill will be when it is passed and when it has become a law, if it is enacted into law. First, there will be two places in the District of Columbia which can obtain licenses to sell alcoholic beverages; that is, beer, wine, whisky, cordial, or anything else of high alcoholic content or low alcoholic content. They can sell everything. They can sell it by the drink. Those two institutions are hotels and restaurants. They are not required to serve meals with it. They can sell it with or without meals. They can sell it at any time to any person who wants to buy it in any amount that he desires to buy, and he can consume it there where he makes the purchase. Your constituents will be required to carry their small children into a bar room for meals. They cannot stop in a hotel that is not a saloon.

Now, there is a difference between a hotel and a restaurant under this bill. I hope the distinguished lady from New Jersey will give me attention here.

HOTELS FAVORED

If I am wrong I want to be corrected. Under this bill a hotel will be permitted to sell alcoholic beverages by the drink. Under this bill a hotel will also be permitted to sell alcoholic beverages in sealed packages, not one pint, one quart, but one keg, or one barrel, or even more. This is the great privilege of a hotel under this bill. No other establishment in the District of Columbia will be permitted to sell it this way. The nearest approach to it will be the restaurant. The restaurant will be permitted to sell it by the drink only and will not be permitted to sell it in sealed packages. There will be other places which will be allowed to sell it in sealed packages only, but the hotel is the only place that can sell it by the drink and in sealed packages. The other establishments are restricted either to sealed packages or, in the case of the restaurant, by the drink.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does the gentleman wish to convey the thought that he is in favor of permitting the tavern and other restaurants to sell also by the package?

Mr. PATMAN. I am saying that in this bill there is a tendency toward a monopoly in the sale of alcoholic beverages.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. Of course, the gentleman understands a hotel pays a very much higher license.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; but the license provided in this bill is insignificant. There are few hotels in the District of Columbia which can qualify under this bill. It is true that at first the number of rooms were placed at 50 and that now an amendment is proposed which will reduce the number of rooms to 30, but even so the number of hotels which can qualify in the District will be very small.

Mrs. NORTON. It will take care of a legitimate hotel, at any rate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a hotel may sell it to be taken off the premises?

Mr. PATMAN. Absolutely.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, I am not in sympathy with that at all. I believe a safeguard should be put in the bill compelling liquor sold by a hotel to be consumed on the premises.

Mr. PATMAN. The hotels are favored in this way under this bill, that they can sell it by the drink and also in quantity, as they desire, either for consumption on the premises or to be taken off the premises in sealed packages. There would be no way for a hotel keeper to enforce a law requiring that liquor delivered in sealed packages must be consumed on the premises.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It might be safeguarded by bringing knowledge home to the hotel and making it an offense if they have knowledge that it is being taken off the premises. Some such proviso should be inserted in the bill.

BILL DOES NOT PROMOTE TEMPERANCE

Mr. PATMAN. Nothing in the bill at present requires it, and if there was it could not be enforced.

Let us see, first, if in this bill there is anything to promote temperance. Ordinarily you would think, in order to promote temperance, there should be a requirement that would not encourage the sale of alcoholic beverages. There is nothing in this bill which restricts advertising, either over the radio or in the newspapers, for the purpose of encouraging the use of hard liquors. In other words, there is nothing in this bill to promote temperance, at least not in this respect.

DOES NOT EFFECTIVELY PREVENT RETURN OF SALOON

Next, let us see if it meets the test of effectively preventing the return of the saloon. How much difference will there be between a place where intoxicating beverages are sold under this bill, and the old saloon? It will sound ridiculous to you when I tell you, but it is the absolute fact.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. I call the gentleman's attention to page 18 of the bill, line 19, specifically the following language:

Beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place—

Spirits, wine, and beer.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentlewoman evidently must have a bill different from the one I have. I have the bill H.R. 6181, and I invite the gentlewoman's attention to line 7 on page 18 of the bill under the heading "Retailer's license, class B", where it is stated that such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to keep for sale and to sell spirits, wines, and beer at the places I have described for consumption only in said place except in the case of clubs and hotels no beverage shall be sold or served to a customer in a closed container.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Under the provisions of the bill to which the gentleman refers, may not any particular place where liquor is sold be designated as a club? May not some temporary arrangement be made by which it shall be known as a club and thereby escape the restrictions against it?

Mr. PATMAN. There is a provision in the bill that the club must have been in existence 3 months. I do not know whether it means before the passage of the bill or before it makes application for a license.

Mr. BLACK. I hope the gentleman will read the next sentence.

GIRLS 18 YEARS OF AGE CAN PURCHASE HARD LIQUORS

Mr. PATMAN. Let us see the further things which may be done. One can go into these establishments and purchase any kind of alcoholic beverage he or she desires. In the case of a man he must be 21 years of age. In the case of a woman she must be 18 years of age in order to go into this place and purchase any kind of alcoholic beverage desired.

Under the old system there was a counter with a bar and a brass rail. Customers could stand up and drink.

MUST SIT DOWN TO BE SERVED

Under this new system the only difference on earth is that they are not permitted to stand at the bar; they must go to a table and sit down and have the perambulating bar come up to them and serve them at the table. There is nothing in this bill to prevent the perambulating bar you have heard and read so much about in the newspapers lately.

Therefore, the only difference is that under the old saloon system one could stand up and drink, whereas under the system provided in this bill one must sit down in order to be served.

I want to ask you, candidly, if you think this is enough difference to justify us in saying we have effectively prevented the return of the saloon?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. It is true, is it not, that in Illinois they are already advocating the abolition of drinking sitting down?

Mr. PATMAN. If I am not correct in this statement, I hope any member of the committee, or any Member of this House, will get up now and tell me so. But I am right about it. The only difference is that one must sit down; and I want to ask you if this is enough to effectively prevent the return of the saloon.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. What does the gentleman suggest—that one should not be allowed to drink at all, either sitting up or standing down?

STOOLS FOR THE BARS

Mr. PATMAN. That is not the material point at all. I am just pointing out what the difference is. Frankly, I think it is just the same as the old saloon system and that it does not effectively prevent the return of the saloon. Now, in the case of wines and beer of any alcoholic content they can be served at a bar or at a counter except they must sit down on a stool if they are served at the bar or the counter. But in order to be served cordials and whiskys they must sit down at a table. This is the only difference on earth between the old saloon and the system now advocated by this Committee for the District of Columbia.

Can you say that that is a sufficient difference for you to go back to your people and tell them that you voted to effectively prevent the return of the saloon, because under the old system they could stand up and drink and you voted for a bill that will require them to sit down in order to drink?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Would it not be much easier to detect intoxication if a purchaser were standing up than if he were sitting down?

Mr. PATMAN. That was mentioned before the committee.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I presented an amendment in the committee that would make all hard-liquor drinking occur on the first floor of buildings and exposed to public view. In other words, I had in mind the plank of the Democratic Party that we were against the return of the old saloon, that we were going to enact a measure to promote temperance and bring the liquor traffic into the open.

It is my contention that if you make people drink in the open, where the neighbors can see them, and if you do away with the cabarets on the second floor, bringing the carabets down to the ground floor where they are open to view, you will not have as many children drinking hard liquor as there are now.

As far as I am concerned, I believe that in order to promote temperance drinking should be brought out into the open. If there is going to be "faking" about this situation, in a few years we will be confronted with the same situation we were 15 years ago. The cabaret and the night club have been the outgrowth of bootleg liquor, and it is that influence I want to abolish. Do you not agree with me that bringing liquor actually into the open as well as theoretically would cut down the intemperate use of it?

Mr. PATMAN. That was suggested in the committee. I want to invite the Members' attention to a report that was filed by the District of Columbia Committee on this bill. I also invite attention to the minority views which I filed, commencing on page 8 of the report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Unfortunately I was called out of the Chamber and I have not had the benefit of the gentleman's statement. May I ask if the gentleman has discussed in his remarks any alternative plan for the handling of the liquor situation in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PATMAN. The committee did not consider an alternative plan except one that was presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] and Dr. Buck, representing the Federal Dispensary League. The Smith plan is that the District of Columbia will have stores in which hard liquors may be sold. Wine and beer will be sold at any hotel or restaurant or possibly at other places in the District of Columbia. Hard liquors may only be sold in sealed packages by the Government stores.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose of those who hold that view to attempt to offer that alternative as a substitute for the pending bill?

Mr. PATMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] will offer it. I do not know for certain, but I presume he will. He insisted upon it in the committee. My view is that if we are to have a dispensary plan we ought to have a plan that will effectively prevent the return of the saloon. My further view is that we should recommit this bill to the District of Columbia Committee and let that committee get together, knowing the will of the House, and draft a bill that will effectively prevent the return of the saloon. Then the committee can consider all plans that may be sponsored by different citizens of the District or by Members of this House.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REILLY. Under the dispensary system you would drive such drinking back to the home, would you not?

Mr. PATMAN. Of course, that is an argument that is made right along. This bill will not prevent people from drinking in the home. That same objection could be urged against almost any bill that you were considering.

Mr. REILLY. Was not one of the evils of the prohibition era that there was too much drinking of hard liquor in the home?

Mr. PATMAN. I will say to the gentleman that this bill will not prevent them from drinking in the home.

Mr. REILLY. They will be compelled to drink it in the home under this bill, will they not?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman from Texas give the Members any information as to the action taken by the several States in regard to the program which they are setting up for the handling of liquor?

Mr. PATMAN. I understand that many of the States are waiting on the District of Columbia bill; that is, they are holding their bills in order to find out what sort of a model bill will be passed by the Congress of the United States in order to carry out the Democratic platform pledge to prevent the return of the saloon. They will then consider measures in the various States.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARLAND. As you have reminded us, the pledge of the Democratic side of the House was to prevent the return of the saloon. I ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill which defines a saloon and attempts to prevent it?

Mr. PATMAN. No; there is no definition of a saloon in this bill. Neither was there a definition of "saloon" given by any witness that appeared before the committee when we were having hearings on the bill.

Mr. MARLAND. May I ask the gentleman if we can prevent the return of something when we do not know what it is?

Mr. PATMAN. Of course, we all have an idea of our own as to what a saloon is. The definition is generally known. We do know that there is no difference in what we had before and what is offered in this bill. The only difference is that the claim is made that under the old saloon they could stand up or sit down, and under this bill they have to sit down in order to be served. That is the only difference.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

REMEMBER THREE OBJECTIONS

Mr. PATMAN. In conclusion, one of the main points to be considered is, does this bill promote temperance. If it does, I challenge any member of the committee to point out to you where there is anything in the bill that is calculated to encourage temperance.

Next, does it effectively prevent the return of the saloon? It does not. It is the old saloon. I repeat, and no one can deny it, the only difference between the old saloon and this new establishment is that under the old saloon system you could either sit down or stand up to be served and under this new bill you have to sit down in order to be served.

The next point is, does it bring the liquor traffic out into the open? It does not. There is no provision in the bill that has for its purpose the bringing of the liquor traffic out into the open.

Therefore I submit to you that this bill should be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I was rather interested and amused at the efforts to make the promise of the Democratic Party platform to do away with the saloon a logical promise. To my mind it is the one statement in the Democratic platform that cannot be made a logical, reasonable statement, because, in the first place, as has been suggested, there is no definition of a saloon, and, in the second place, from our knowledge of the history of human nature, I do not believe it would be possible to do away with either a saloon or something to take the place of a saloon, as long as we are going to have drinking of alcoholic beverages.

There are three classes of people who drink. One is the man who takes liquor for medicine. Another is the psychopathic who takes a bottle of liquor and goes off to himself somewhere and drinks to intoxication, and the other class comprises the great bulk of people who drink for sociability purposes. This class includes those people who realize or feel that they have in themselves an inhibiting wall about themselves—a product of civilized development that they want temporarily to remove. They wish temporarily to retrograde a little—to let go; to go on the loose. These people gather together in order to know each other better; in order to inculcate a higher degree of sociability, they drink, not to excess, but just for social purposes. They must have some place to do this. It is far better to have it in some place that is under reasonable control than it is to compel them, as was done during the prohibition era, to go to a hotel and there drink to excess under conditions that the people participating did not really desire.

We can call such a place a saloon or a grocery or a barber shop or anything else, but as long as men drink to promote sociability you will never do away with sociability; you will never do away with some gathering place to drink. You might just as well talk about removing the rear end of a train in order to do away with rear-end collisions.

The social gathering place, psychologically, and from the history of the human race, is so much wrapped up in the whole problem of drinking that to do away with one you have to do away with the other, and we have already found out that you cannot do away with the drinking.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Let us just look at this question squarely. We must have some place where people can drink. We do not want to force our young men and young women to go back into the hip-flask-toting era if we can help it. We do not want them to take their bottles home or to some place of hiding and there drink to excess; and if we recognize this commonsense situation, the fair thing and the honest thing and the nonhypocritical thing to do is to meet it under the best conditions of control that we can get. The more foolish, nonsensical regulations we put around it about requiring them to stand up to drink or sit down to drink or, as the gentleman just said, "to sit up or stand down", which sounds like a discussion in Alice in Wonderland—the more things of this kind we inject or write into the bill the more ridiculous it will be.

I know the government-dispensary plan has never worked out according to the desires of the people who have proposed it. It has created great political machines and has not been effective in promoting temperance in any way; at least, our experience in the Carolinas has been to that effect. It has not produced temperance, satisfactory revenue, nor reduced lawlessness, and the only sensible way to handle this situation is to operate under the most simple license plan possible; to meet it as it exists and not as we would wish it to exist. [Applause.]

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN was recognized.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield before he begins?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Why is it necessary to establish a separate board, as this bill provides?

Mr. DIRKSEN. This board will take the place of the existing board.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Section 5, paragraph (c), provides that no place shall be deemed appropriate if the owners of a majority of the real property within a radius of 600 feet of the boundary object to the granting of a license. Does that hold over for more than a year?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is a matter to be determined largely by the board, because they have been given wide discretionary powers in the bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. They might make a large investment this year and then the next year have the citizens decide against them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If they managed it in accordance with the requirements of the board, so far as the decorum of the place and the character of the management is concerned, they could probably continue.

Mr. BOILEAU. But that might prevent the transfer of property.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is true.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This bill provides for a new board of 3 men at $6,000 salary, 3 corporation counsel, and numerous other employees. I should like to know the reason or necessity for that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There will be a considerable amount of work; there will be probably upward of 2,000 applications in the District of Columbia, and it will take a large personnel to handle the applications made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further. I listened with a good deal of interest to my colleague from Texas and the other distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who still frowns upon repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and who would, if he could, imperil the precious fruits of repeal. It may be that Texas does not know that the eighteenth amendment has been repealed. This is a bill to enable the people of the District of Columbia to get a drink, if and when they want it, under proper regulation.

We have seen what prohibition and the effects of restriction would do, and so we have here only the question of retail principle to consider, and not so much the mechanical provisions of the bill. Do we want to provide liquor for the people of the District of Columbia under a private system, or shall it be done by the dispensary system? I say, categorically, that I am opposed to the dispensary system. It has not worked out satisfactorily, notably in South Carolina, where they had it for 12 years. Besides it is putting the Government into the liquor business. Until we come to a state of consistency by having the Government take over the distilleries as well as the outlets, I say that I am opposed to the dispensary system as being half fish and half fowl.

Generally speaking, this is designed not only to eliminate the old saloon but also to make it reasonably easy, under proper circumstances, for a man or a woman of legal age to secure a drink of liquor if he or she wants it. The argument that this is restoring the saloon is just a lot of hooey. You know what the old saloon was—a place where they had curtains, a place where they had a back room, a place where men shuffled around in various states of intoxication, a place where men would loaf in the course of the day, soaking themselves with periodic drinks. Can anyone say that a restaurant, conducted according to all the rules and regulations set up in this bill, or a hotel dining room, decorously managed, is in any way analogous to the old saloon? As my distinguished friend from Michigan so aptly put it in the committee, this is designed to take the bend out of the elbow and put it in the knee. You are asked to sit down at a table in order to take your drink if you are going to take it by the drink rather than take it in a package to your homes to consume. There is a good reason for that seemingly whimsical provision. The same Dr. Buck, who is the legislative agent of the Tax Reduction League in the District of Columbia, who has been a practicing physician for 23 years, is the same doctor who has made observations for a number of years, and who said that when men congregate at a bar, ordinarily the inveterate drinker will stand there and consume three drinks within 15 minutes; and it has been his observation that when a man sits down to a table to drink it will take at least an hour to consume three drinks of ardent spirits.

There is a certain conviviality, there is a certain fellowship, and more time elapses; and who can say that sitting at a table enjoying fellowship under decorous surroundings is bringing back the old saloon? I think we are in accord with the program of both the Democratic and Republican Parties in this bill, because by no stretch of the imagination can anybody see that the old saloon is being returned.

I want to enumerate for the purpose of clarity in a general way what this bill contains. First of all there is a beverage board consisting of three men. They are to receive $6,000 a year each. You say that that is too much. Oh, well, you can amend the bill and reduce it to $4,000, if you so desire. That is a technicality. This board has been clothed with full administrative and executive power to examine into the character and fitness of the men who make application for on-sale and off-sale licenses and generally to conduct the entire liquor business here through administrative channels.

The bill contains also a differentiation between a liquor license and a beer license. In that respect we have followed the Rockefeller Foundation report. The Rockefeller Foundation expended a lot of time and money, and, I believe, sent a copy of their report to every Member of the House and Senate, and you will notice they drew a distinction between a license to be issued to a purveyor of beer and a license to be issued to a purveyor of liquor. If you will examine the character of licenses provided for in the bill, you will see that that distinction is very carefully carried out.

I allude now, for a moment, to the revenue features of the bill. If I remember the figures correctly, the Commissioners anticipate that this bill will raise approximately three quarters of a million dollars per year through all the manufacturing and wholesale and retail outlets for which application may be made.

I have already alluded to table drinking. The bill provides also for the sale and purchase of package liquor, so that one can go to a grocery store that has an off-sale license or to some kind of a liquor store where they sell liquor by the package and buy what you want and take it to your home and there consume it, if one prefers to do that as distinguished from going to a restaurant or a hotel dining room for a drink.

Nothing has been done about advertising. That raises a very fine point as to whether we should say to the newspapers of the District that under this bill they shall have no right to quote the prices of whisky, claret, port, sherry, Madeira, and all of the other things that are manufactured. I can see no reason for that. If we are giving a cloak of legitimacy to the distiller, to the rectifying business, then why should we seek to penalize a newspaper by precluding it from accepting advertisements and securing that additional revenue? It takes a rather fancy stretch of the imagination to say that an advertisement in a newspaper quoting the price of liquor can be said to encourage the consumption of liquor or that it is at variance with temperance.

The bill provides for a meticulous examination of the character of the manager of a licensed place as well as the owner or applicant. If anyone has ever been convicted of a felony, if anyone, in the estimation of the liquor board, is not of proper character to run this business, no license will be issued. That indicates further the amount of administrative authority that has been conferred upon the liquor board. After all, whether it be in the District of Columbia or in some State of the Union, the efficacy of the administration of a liquor control act is going to be nothing more than a reflection of the personalities of the men who are appointed on the liquor board, and when you think of that, in the light of the fact that we are in a rather probationary stage just now, that this thing is new, that it still presents novel aspects, and that it can be changed at any time by this House, I say, in view of all this, this is the kind of a bill that eliminates undue restriction and gives the people of the District of Columbia a right to have a drink under proper surroundings if they so desire.

To that little militant, vocal minority on the prohibition side, let me say that if they do not like it they do not have to go into a dining room and take a drink, because that is a matter for everybody to determine for himself.

I am entirely out of sympathy with the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who just preceded me, who still seeks to inject dry prejudices after the eighteenth amendment has been repealed by the sovereign voice of the people of this country.

One thing more: A question came up in the committee as to whether a man should be compelled to go into a dining room and purchase a meal before he could have a drink. The idea of loading up every drink with a meal would make it rather difficult for a man who wanted to buy a couple of drinks to secure them without becoming intemperate in his eating. There must be some limit. There must be some exercise of discretion, and above all else there must be exercise of common sense. When you view this bill in the large, you can see that adequate provision has been made for the protection of the District, for the protection of the schools and churches, for the protection of the people generally, and at the same time make it possible for people in an orderly fashion to walk into the dining room of the Shoreham or Wardman Park, or any other hotel in the District, and sit down, and there in convivial company secure a drink.

Another rather important thing that was written into this bill is the provision that no credit shall be established, or no credit shall be advanced in an on-sale drinking emporium for the purpose of buying liquor. The reason for that is this: You can readily understand that a man who might be temporarily out of work and without funds wants a drink and he goes to an on-sale emporium. He knows the owner or proprietor quite well, and he says, "I should like to have a drink, but I haven't got any money." Now, it is conceivable that the proprietor, thinking perhaps he will find a job in a week or two, will extend to him a line of credit and let him drink up $50 or $60 worth of ardent spirits, that must ultimately come out of the family budget, and operate as a penalty upon the wife and children of that family. That has been restricted by the provisions of this bill, insofar as that can be done by legislation. I believe after all it is the best guarantee against the so-called "soaking" that was one of the necessary incidents to the old saloon.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. What does this bill do to a man who comes in and has a drink and announces afterward that he is broke?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota just raised the point as to what a man would do if he went in and got a drink and announced his financial embarrassment afterward. It is just one of those things, I should say to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, but I assume that the proprietor or manager of the place would know precisely how to deal with a gentleman like that.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. In providing retail licenses for the sale of all brands of liquor, has there been any provision made for the purchase of liquor that has had the Government tax paid, or can a retail dealer sell any kind of liquor? I cannot find where there is any provision made to prevent a retail licensee from selling bootleg liquor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say that it is not necessary to make that kind of a recital in the District liquor bill.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. There is such a provision in section 36 of the bill, which I addressed to the committee, and it reads as follows:

SEC. 36. No rectified or blended spirits shall be sold unless the container in which it is sold shall bear a legible lable firmly affixed thereto stating the nature and percentage of each ingredient therein, the age of each such ingredient, and the alcoholic content of such spirits by volume.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That does not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROOKS. No. I want to make sure about this. The bootleggers are already starting to print that kind of label. I want to know if there is any provision that could be made that would make that liquor justified as having the Government tax paid by the wholesaler.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That recital is not necessary, because that constitutes a violation, under the Treasury regulation.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. In the bill that was passed recently the tariff provision requiring a stamp to be affixed to the container showing that the tax has been paid would, of course, apply to liquor sold in the District of Columbia, as well as elsewhere.

Mr. BROOKS. That would revoke his license?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, yes; and it would be a matter of enforcement for the Treasury or the Department of Internal Revenue.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MARLAND. I understand that a patron in a hotel accustomed to paying his bills once a month, and to signing his dinner check, would have to pay cash for anything he got to drink?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think that is handled by the provision that it shall not operate to prejudice a club member, for instance, in his right to secure a line of credit in his club. Probably the same thing would apply in the case of a hotel.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. If the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman is misinformed as to the nature of the question which was asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOKS]. There is no protection now to either the drinker or the Government on the liquor called "a blend" that is sold in a closed container. In other words, not only in the District of Columbia but in the State of Michigan bootleggers are putting out blends, which do not require an internal-revenue stamp, and which we did not remedy by the bill we passed the other day, and which is not protected in this bill. I think that should be called to the attention of the Members of this House. A blend does not require the affixation of a revenue stamp or any kind of a stamp.

Mr. BROOKS. That is exactly what I referred to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I submit to the gentleman of the Ways and Means Committee as to whether a provision to that effect was also incorporated in the revenue bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No such provision was in the revenue bill passed a few days ago.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman recalls that I offered such an amendment and it was ruled out of order.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes. I recall the gentleman did offer such an amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I think the gentleman has in mind is this: What is to prevent the wholesaler—for instance, a liquor store—selling goods which have been furnished to him by a bootlegger? Of course, if he is doing this, it is unauthorized as far as the board of commissioners or control is concerned. Let us have the authority to revoke the license of such a wholesaler.

Mr. DIRKSEN. They do.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know whether it is specified in the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The board has this power, and also the power and machinery with which they can ascertain the source of liquor sales. It is definite, and I think it is ample. Provision is made in this bill to accomplish the purpose the gentleman has in mind.

I allude also to the fact that under the old saloon and brewery systems it was quite possible for a brewer to purchase, or to lease, any number of parcels of real estate and to establish them as retail outlets for his brewery. One of the recommendations of the Rockefeller committee was that there must be an elimination of the so-called "tied" house; there must be an elimination of the feature whereby the brewer could exercise complete control over the retail outlets, likewise the distilleries, and likewise the rectifiers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield me 2 additional minutes.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The bill contains a further provision for eliminating control through the instrumentalities of interlocking directorates, subscriptions to stock, gifts of fixtures, money, or otherwise. This has been completely eliminated; so we will no longer have what was known as the "old system" whereby the brewer or the distiller could so effectively regulate the retail outlets that they practically owned them outright. I think this is essential; and as I hear these discussions of the old-time saloon I sometimes wonder if, after all, they do not refer to the old-time saloon system, rather than to the saloon as such, where there was a close, coordinated relationship between the brewery, the distiller, and the retail outlets which gave rise to all the iniquity and vice of the old system. This, I believe, has been effectively eliminated in the provisions of this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman tell us what can prevent the situation we have in New York whereby his Peoria distillers are advancing the license fee of $750, or whatever it is, to the people in New York who sell his Peoria liquor? Does the bill specifically prevent the distillers from advancing money for the license fee to the retailers?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The bill provides against the advance of money of any kind for such a purpose.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I realize the difficulty of drafting a bill to control the sale of liquor. I said a few days ago there was no great hurry about this bill; because after you get the liquor it is going to be very dangerous to drink it, and probably you will not have the money to pay the exorbitant prices the Whisky Trust will ask for it. But it is fundamental, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, that the more regulations you put on the sale of liquor the greater trouble you will get into. Every regulation is an avenue of graft. Every regulation points a way for somebody to proceed to extort graft from the purveyors of this liquor. If you say by your regulations that one cannot drink standing up, that you must drink sitting down; if you say sales shall be made to be drunk only on the premises but not to be drunk off the premises; if you fix the hours of business, in all these things you open avenues of graft.

Why, before December 5, the date of repeal, in New York, before repeal was even effective, the "boys" were out "shaking down", as they say, the prospective customers. If you provide that these commissioners of the District can say where the rum is to be sold, that it may be sold in certain zones, you open avenues for graft.

As far as I am concerned—and I took this position on the beer bill—I would let anybody sell liquor who wanted to sell it, in any place, provided they paid the license fee. I would let 7 or 8 of them sell it in a row alongside of each other in the same block, for then they might kill each other off. That is the way to abolish the saloon: To provide for universal sale and not make a congregating place out of the licensed place of sale.

I believe this bill will be fairly good if amended in certain particulars. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN] will offer the "label amendment." If nobody else does, I shall offer an amendment that druggists can sell only on a prescription that is a real prescription, according to the United States Pharmacopœia; that they cannot sell "blended" or "cut" whisky which might go into the mouths of babes 1 year old, or be used by elderly people.

I do not know why, Madam Chairman, you charge a brewer a license fee of $2,500, whereas you charge a distiller only $2,000. Why the discrimination?

As to the dispensary system, I have always taken the position that this was the last method our Government should ever resort to in the control of the liquor business. I have said repeatedly that I never want to see my Government, my State, or my city in the rum business.

There is a lot of talk about the saloon. This is one of the bromides that has grown up by mere constant repetition. I was always frank enough to say I was not against the saloon provided it was a good saloon. Some one has yet to define what a saloon is. Why, there are rotten, disreputable dance halls, yet we license them. There are billiard parlors which are only dens of gangsters, yet we license them. We license beauty parlors and massage parlors which conduct an illegitimate business. Whether or not a saloon is a decent place is solely a question of local enforcement.

This idea that a man must drink sitting down instead of standing up, after the American habit of drinking standing up has become so imbedded in our people, is ridiculous. It is a sop and an attempt in some way to appease the "dry" element which fought for prohibition.

Why, there is a provision in this bill continuing the old law which says you cannot take a drink in public, on the street, in your automobile, on the platform of a railroad station, and so forth. In other words, if I am taking a train to New York and have a bottle of real whisky with me and feel ill, although I paid for the bottle and it is my own property, I may not use it; I cannot drink it, but must sneak into the restaurant or a hotel to drink my own liquor.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is such regulatory provisions which will bring back the old hold-ups we had during prohibition.

I believe that if there can be a few amendments added to this bill and if the board or the commissioners do not throw too many regulations around it, it may work. If the purpose of repeal of the eighteenth amendment is truly carried out for the benefit of the people who might want the opportunity to drink; who did not want restrictions thrown around what they thought their personal rights; who wanted an opportunity to get a drink when they wanted it; who voted for that principal; the proper regulation of the traffic will restore temperance, but an improper or excessive regulation will put us in a worse position than that in which we existed during prohibition.

Mrs. NORTON. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 8 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am going to need 23 minutes. So much has been said on the question of liquor control that I hesitate to say anything further on the subject. However, I believe the Members of the House would like to have some information on the subject relating to the two outstanding systems of liquor control as they are being formed at this time in public opinion.

One is the type of control proposed by the committee bill. I am opposed to the bill as drafted by the committee. I favor the dispensary system. I introduced a bill, which was before the committee, for the dispensary system. That bill is H.R. 6148, and I hope the Members of the House will take the opportunity to look over that bill before casting their vote on this one.

So far as the committee bill is concerned, I think the chairman of the District Committee [Mrs. NORTON] is entitled to the thanks of the people of the District of Columbia and the Members of this House for the great amount of work and toil that she has put in on the bill. If you are going to have such a system in the Capital of the United States, I believe the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] has perhaps presented to you just as good a bill as can be presented. But I do not think that in the Capital city of the United States liquor ought to be dispensed under such a plan. I believe that we should adopt the dispensary plan. I believe that we owe it to the people under our party platform not to permit the private sale of whisky to be consumed by the drink on the premises where sold and handled for private profit.

The bill which I favor and which I am going to seek to get a vote on in the Committee of the Whole before this matter is concluded is fundamentally the Canadian system. It is adapted from the Quebec system, so I claim no pride of authorship in the bill at all. I got it in this way: In Virginia, after the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, we had a special session of our legislature. A commission was provided to devise some plan for the control of liquor in the State of Virginia. The Governor of the State of Virginia selected the most outstanding and the most prominent persons, some of whom were for and some against prohibition, and put them on the commission to draft a bill for the State of Virginia. From the melting pot of these conflicting views was brought forth the Quebec system fundamentally. This has the approval of the outstanding drys in our State and has the approval of the outstanding wets in our State as being the best and most practical way to control this situation.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Certainly.

Mrs. NORTON. I have an article here from the Herald of January 9, 1934, headed as follows: "Dispensaries Plan Denounced by Drys."

It would not seem from a reading of this article that the drys are in favor of the dispensary plan, and I quote the Reverend Ira Lindrith, of Winona Lake, Ind., and also Dr. E. H. Cook, Denver cleric, who lived many years in Canada, and who held up as an horrible example the Canadian liquor system. He declared that under Province control there drunkenness increased fourfold, hard-liquor consumption twofold, wine consumption fivefold. Dr. Cook further stated that there are 3,355 speak-easies in Quebec, and that British Columbia is the bootleggers' paradise.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Was that a question or just a comment?

Mrs. NORTON. That was an observation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Well, I will make an observation myself. I do not know who is in favor of this system or who is against it. I merely know that I am expressing the views which I have and I certainly would not undertake to change the views of any Member of this House. We have conflicting views upon many subjects, and I am not here for the purpose of influencing anyone's views, but I am here for the purpose of saying to you that there are two ways to control the liquor question. One is sale by the drink, for private profit, to be consumed on the premises. This is inherently and necessarily a barroom.

I have heard the discussions about this matter upon the floor of this House and I listened to the discussions before the joint committee of the Senate and House. I participated in those discussions, and I challenged any proponent of this bill at that time to point out the distinction between the bill which the committee proposes and the old-time barroom, and no one could point out any difference except the difference between standing up and sitting down.

Under the bill which is proposed by the committee, where liquors may be sold in restaurants and hotels, any person who is over 21 years of age, be he man or woman, boy or girl, may go into a hotel or a restaurant and may seat himself or herself at a table and he or she may drink just as many varieties of liquor as there are on the shelf and can get just as drunk, or perhaps drunker, than he or she could if he or she were standing up. This has all of the old, inherent evils of the barroom.

The authorities I have read on the subject seem to agree that the chief, inherent evil in the old system of dispensing liquor was the element of private profit. One of the gentlemen who spoke a few minutes ago in favor of the Commissioners' bill was bold enough to quote the report of the Rockefeller Foundation as substantiating his position. Let me read to you the conclusion of the report of the Rockefeller Foundation:

> On the basis of past experience in the United States and abroad and the practical considerations we have just received, we have come to the conclusion that the most satisfactory solution of the problem of alcohol requires the elimination of the private-profit motive in the retail sale of liquor. This cannot conceivably be accomplished under a license system however rigid and well enforced. If we sincerely wish to meet only an unstimulated demand for alcohol, we can no longer leave to any individual a private stake in its retail sale.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Briefly, please.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman would rather not yield, I will not put my question.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I would rather not, because I think my time is very limited and I want to get along with my discussion of the bill.

The bill which I propose, which is the dispensary system, provides for the sale of hard liquors in sealed packages under a control board operated by the District of Columbia, with no private profit to anybody in hard liquor. It does provide, however, for the sale, under a license system, in hotels and restaurants of wines and beer. In other words, it seeks to bring about that thing which seems to be so much desired of attempting to encourage the use of beer and wine as against the use of hard liquors.

There has been some discussion of the South Carolina system. If you will read the Rockefeller report—and my time is so limited I have not the time to read it to you—you will find a very cogent reason why the South Carolina experiment was a failure. You will find, in the first place, it was inextricably mixed up with the matter of politics and, in the second place, you will find that in those dispensaries there existed the inherent evil of which I have spoken of private profit.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I have before me the temporary price list of the Liquor Board of Pennsylvania and it offsets the gentleman's argument because this statement shows it to be almost a patriotic duty in Pennsylvania to buy liquor, because it says that every loyal citizens, by patronizing the system, will assist in its success and that the board is proceeding with the utmost speed to obtain full stocks, and that it will be profitable to buy from the board. This is propaganda coming from the State of Pennsylvania urging its citizens to drink in the dispensaries.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Is that a question or a comment?

Mr. BLACK. No; it is a help. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I may say to you that I know there are Members of this House who do not want the private sale of liquor system, and do not want to vote for such a system here today. This is the only bill now before the Committee, and I want to give the Committee an opportunity to vote for an alternative plan, namely, the dispensary system; and at the proper time, after the reading of the first section of the bill, I propose to move to strike out that section and to substitute in place thereof the dispensary bill, which is H.R. 6143, and by this method I hope to test the sentiment of the House on this subject.

There are just two systems, and to save your life you cannot find any reasonable distinction between the bill offered by the Commissioners and the old system of the saloons. The difference, which has been mentioned, is the difference between standing up and sitting down. There is, also, a further difference and it is a most important one. In the old days drinking in the saloons was confined to the men. Under this bill men and women, together or separately, may sit in these restaurants and in these hotels and drink as long as they can hold it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes; I will. I find I have more time than I thought.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman, of course, realizes that men and women may go to a dispensary and buy a quart of liquor. Does the gentleman contend they will not get drunk on that liquor, because it is bought from a dispensary?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No; I do not contend that at all. I merely contend that of the two systems the dispensary system, I believe, is the best, and comes nearer carrying out the promise of the Democratic Party to the people of America when we repealed the eighteenth amendment.

I do not say that the dispensary system is the ideal thing. I do not know what is the ideal system. If we knew, I am sure we could adopt it in a very few moments, because I am quite confident that the proponents of this bill are as sincere and honest in their convictions that it is the ideal plan as I am in my conviction that the dispensary is the ideal plan.

You are going to find objections to all bills for the control of liquor. There always have been and there always will be. When we repealed the eighteenth amendment it was because the people wanted to repeal it, and they wanted in place of it some substitute for the evils of those conditions. Both parties solemnly promised that if the eighteenth amendment was repealed that we would not have a return of the old open saloon. And when the proclamation was made by the President on December 5 of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, he made a statement—I do not recall the exact words—but he recalled that promise to the people of the country and said:

> I hope that no State in this Union will adopt any system of liquor control that would bring about the return of the saloon, either in its old form or in any modern guise.

Now, will someone tell me—and I will yield him time for the purpose—where is the inherent difference between this bill and the situation of the old saloon? Here is a proposal whereby any hotel or restaurant may sell liquor by the drink, have it consumed on the premises, just as many drinks as the person wants to buy, as many as he can pay for, and the only difference is you have to sit down at a table while you drink. In other words, you do not have to buy any more in the restaurant under this bill than you did in the old saloon, or any less.

I hope before this debate is concluded that some of the proponents of the bill on the other side who are as sincere in their views as I am in mine—I do hope some one will take occasion to try to convince the House that there is a practical distinction between the plan proposed in this bill and that of the old saloon.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. MARLAND. Does the gentleman contend that the provisions of this bill do not carry out the pledge of the Democratic Party?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LANZETTA. Does not the gentleman feel that the most vicious drinking in the past has been behind closed doors and not in open places?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am not qualified to answer that.

Mr. LANZETTA. I do not know that I am qualified, but I believe that the most vicious drinking has been behind closed doors.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman may be right about that. I will not argue it.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is advocating a system whereby if an individual wants a drink of liquor he cannot get it without buying a pint or a quart.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. He could not get it without buying a sealed package. A dispensary may sell a gill in a sealed package.

Mr. SISSON. I take it that it is the gentleman's contention that no opportunity shall be given for the individual to get a drink of liquor except if he buys a quart or a pint and takes it home.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. He could take it to a club or a hotel—take it to his own room.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman inform the House as to what action has been taken, in other States except his own, which he has referred to, regarding this question?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think they have taken it under consideration. In my State the legislature has not acted—the board has. In Pennsylvania, I believe, they are trying it.

Mr. BRITTEN. They have had it for a month in Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Under the gentleman's bill is there any limitation upon what one individual could buy in a day?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No.

Mr. PALMISANO. He could buy 150 quarts if he wanted to, if he went back to the same store, in one day.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman does not like that feature. I will tell you, then, what we will do. If the House will vote with me, and let us have a dispensary bill, we will send it back to Mr. PALMISANO's committee, and I am sure that Mrs. NORTON will draw just as good a bill under the dispensary system as she has drawn on the other side. I am not concerned with the details of this bill. You can write the bill any way you want to, but I think that we ought to write it around the principle that there shall be no sale of spirits for profit to be consumed on the premises where purchased. That is the fundamental difference between the two.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. As I understand the gentleman's bill, he is aiming to force upon the consumer the drinking of a bottle at a time rather than a glass at a time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. He can drink a bottle if he wants to, but he can drink two bottlefuls by drinking in the hotel under this other bill. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I think, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said, this debate is largely a matter of the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. I believe if this Congress were to debate this question for the balance of the session you could not draft and pass a law that would satisfy the honest, legitimate dry, who does not drink, who does not want other people to drink, nor could you satisfy the straddling statesman or politician who drinks wet and votes dry. Let us get down to the fundamentals of this issue. I happen to have been a resident of the first county in Ohio that voted dry under local option. My little town of Sycamore, of 900 population, was one of the first towns in Ohio to vote dry under local option. When the three saloons went out of business—and every man who has ever been in a saloon knows that we had good saloons and bad saloons in the old days—the two drug stores in the town took over the business. One drug store had a roll-top desk about half-way back on the floor. The druggist had the top of the desk piled full of books, but in the desk he had a neat little bar. You could go in there and pour yourself out a drink for 10 cents, while in the drawer at the side, which was full of half pints, you could pick up one and leave a quarter on the desk for it. In the next drawer there were pints, and you could pick one of those out and deposit 50 cents on the desk for it.

When the county went dry our citizens who wanted a drink simply went to the neighboring counties. The point is that you cannot in a few years—in 15 years—destroy the appetite that has accumulated in the human race through 5,000 years. People who want to drink will drink, regardless of the character or quality of the stuff they drink.

Away back before prohibition I remember we had in my little town a lecture by a noted temperance lecturer. During the course of his remarks he used two water glasses to illustrate the point he was attempting to make, namely, the evil effects of alcohol on the human system. These glasses were both filled with a colorless fluid such as in the glass here on this table. He took up one of the glasses and reached into his pocket and drew forth a little tin box. He snapped the lid open and said, "Now, ladies and gentlemen, watch what I do." He pulled a fishworm out of the box and dropped it into the glass that he said was filled with water. He said, "You notice that nothing happens to the worm"; and the worm wiggled around apparently contented and happy. "Now", he said, "see what happens to this worm when I drop it into the other glass", which was also filled with a colorless fluid. He dropped the worm into this glass and immediately the worm stiffened out and was dead. A fellow jumped up in the rear of the hall and said, "Mister, what was in that glass that killed that fishworm?"

The lecturer replied, "That was old triple-distilled moonshine, 110 proof." "Well", the fellow said, "save me a glass of it; I am troubled awful bad with worms." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to my distinguished colleagues who have spent a great deal of time in debate about stopping bootleggers and the difference between a saloon and a parlor or a restaurant and the difference between standing up and sitting down—as many of you old timers recall, many people had to drink lying down, and they will probably drink that way today. The real question that confronts us is this: The American people decided that prohibition was a failure.

They said that prohibition was a failure by sending wet Congressmen and Senators to Washington to replace dry Congressmen and Senators. The successful Democratic candidate for the nomination for President of the United States declared that he was for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The platform of the Democratic National Convention adopted at Chicago declared for repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The candidate who was nominated by the Democratic Party said in his memorable acceptance speech, "You want repeal. I want repeal. The people want repeal"; and thanks to the tireless energy, the unswerving devotion to principle of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the greatest friend of the common people to sit in the Presidential chair since Lincoln and Wilson, and his loyal coworkers, the twenty-first amendment, repealing prohibition, is a part of the Constitution of the United States today.

During the past few months the question of prohibition repeal was submitted to more than 36 States. Only two of the States voted to retain the prohibition system. In nearly every one of the other States the vote was preponderantly in favor of repeal.

Yet we find the Congress of the United States today quibbling over such minor details as to the manner and form of the places in which liquor shall be sold and how it shall be drunk. If all the advocates of the various postures in which it would be legal to drink liquors and wines, including those who advocate drinking it standing up, those who say it should be be taken sitting down, and those who reach the stage where it can be taken in no other than a reclining or lying-down position, cannot get together, perhaps we may have to compromise by devising some mechanical means whereby the heavy imbiber may take it from a trough as we slop our hogs back in Ohio, the medium drinker can take it either standing up or in a semireclining position, while the fellow who votes dry and drinks wet, without doubt, will have to be twitched on the nose and drenched, like we farmers give medicine to our horses when they are sick with the colic.

Like Nero, we fiddle while Rome burns. The American people decided at least 4 years ago that prohibition was a failure insofar as enforcement was concerned. I personally know that the American people reached that decision at least 4 years ago, because I was defeated for the nomination for United States Senator from Ohio by a gentleman who sensed the revolt against prohibition and came out on a platform for repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

The gentleman from Virginia and other gentlemen believe, and sincerely so, that a dispensary system would be a better system than the system proposed in this bill; that it would better promote temperance; that it would put the bootleggers out of business; and that it would promote sobriety and prevent drunkenness and debauchery among our young people.

Experience teaches us that this is a fallacious doctrine and theory. On the other hand, observation teaches us that more and uncontrolled drunkenness and debauchery of both our young manhood and our young womanhood can take place within the narrow confines of a hotel room than formerly occurred in a dozen of the old saloons. Experience teaches us also that drunkenness can only be reduced by individual self-control, by being temperate in all things—not only temperate in the use of intoxicating liquors but temperate in the consumption and varieties of food consumed. The matress-fronted fat dowager and the pot-bellied street-corner politician are just as intemperate in their habits of eating, and as obnoxious to their fellow men, as the red-nosed drunkard, whose appetite for spirituous liquors is uncontrolled.

Before prohibition the country had practically the same dispensing system that we will now have under this bill. The assertion has also been made on the floor of this House that in preprohibition days only men were permitted to drink in the barrooms. This is distinctly not the case, as many barrooms or cafes may be recalled that catered to both men and women. We had the barroom where hard liquor, beer, and wines might be purchased by the drink, by the pint, the quart, or the gallon. We had the wholesale liquor houses, where only whisky, wines, and brandies might be purchased by the quart, the gallon, or the barrel. In those warehouses good unbonded whisky could be purchased for as low as $2.50 a gallon.

Yet drunkenness always depended upon the capacity of the individual. I recall of one farm hand and hog feeder employed on my farm in the old days—a big, broad, rugged, two-fisted six-footer—who spent about 16 hours a day working in the open air, who on every Saturday night would journey to the nearest wholesale liquor house and buy 1 gallon of liquor. He took 4 drinks a day, 1 before breakfast, 1 before dinner, 1 before supper, and 1 before retiring. The glass that he used for the drinks was an ordinary water glass. He did not have to mix it as a highball, but "took his liquor straight." The man never became drunk, to my knowledge. He had a great capacity.

Please do not consider this a defense of the old system, nor a defense of the excessive use of spiritous liquors. It is merely a statement of facts, to prove conclusively that American citizens who want to drink will have their drink when and how they want it, regardless of governmental laws, edicts, or regulations.

Mention has been made of the findings and recommendations of the Rockefeller Foundation. They recommend that all private profits be taken from the distribution of liquor. I wonder if John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who contributed $5,000 to the National Economy League to slander the American war veteran, prostitute his widow, and debauch his orphan child, would be willing to take the private profit out of the distribution of gasoline and oils to stop the bootlegging of gasoline.

When you take the private profit out of legal distribution of liquors, wines, and beers, you only divert it into the slimy pockets of the bootleggers, rumrunners, and racketeers. All of these evils have sprung up largely because of the maladjustment of economic and social well-being in this country, the concentration of huge wealth in the hands of a few, the maldistribution of the earnings of the country, the strangulation of the economic circulatory system, the throwing out of jobs of 15,000,000 wageworkers, the annihilation of private business by the huge trusts and mergers, the breaking of the backs of the masses of the people by the shifting of the tax burden from the public utilities, the Wall Street buccaneers and pirates, the banking crooks, the silk-stocking aristocracy to the already bent backs of the small-home owner, wageworker, and farmer.

Regardless of what the tax on liquor may or may not be, regardless of what regulations are adopted, regardless of what enforcement measures are employed, you will have the bootlegger with you until you can give him an honest and a better way to earn a living, until you give every able-bodied man a job that will keep himself and his family in decent style, until you have a limit on the amount of wealth any individual can accumulate, until you limit the amount of income any individual may receive in a single year, and, finally, until you shift this crushing tax burden from the backs of the poor to the ill-gotten wealth of the millionaire crowd—human vultures waxing fat on the bleaching bones of the struggling masses who are ruthlessly trampled down by their lustful plundering for more wealth and more millions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that during the 1 minute allotted me I may proceed out of order in order to read a telegram from Chicago which I have just received, which is not controversial at all. I want to read it, not only for the benefit of the House but particularly for the benefit of the 27 Members from Illinois. I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BLACK. This is the first time the gentleman has ever asked to be out of order.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, this telegram has just been received:

> For the first time in more than 25 years, at least, there was no milk delivered in Chicago today to homes. Scores of thousands of small children were accordingly denied their main sustenance. The enfeebled and those requiring milk diet also were forced to use condensed milk or to go without. In view of the general situation, with which you undoubtedly are familiar, do you not think a congressional investigation at this time is warranted?

This is signed by John W. Dienhart, city editor of the Herald-Examiner.

My reason for rising at this time, my friends, is to call to the attention of at least the 10 Members of the House from Chicago the situation existing in Chicago, where mothers and children are not getting any milk today. It may be impossible for the Federal Government, through its Department of Justice, to do anything in the premises, but surely some way must be found by Federal authorities, if not by the local authorities, to see that milk is allowed to be delivered. If necessary, they should guard every milk wagon. I would like to speak with all Members from Illinois on this subject at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Chairman, since receiving this telegram I have communicated with the Attorney General with a view to having the Federal Department of Justice take such steps as it may deem necessary and as are permitted under the Federal statutes for the protection of human life and private property in the most destructive milk strike that this country has ever had. The Attorney General is today communicating with representatives of the Department of Justice in Chicago for complete information concerning the various elements of the strike which has been brought about by the disagreement between the producers and the distributors on the price of milk. It is interesting to note that the United States Supreme Court only on yesterday handed down a decision which placed the rights of the people above the laws of the land in national emergencies. I refer to a decision on the Minnesota case, which directly affects the National Recovery Act.

As for myself, I would not hesitate to request the calling out of the Federal troops at Fort Sheridan if that act were necessary in order to insure the delivery of milk to the homes of Chicago.

I also talked with officials in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and learned that they had communicated with D. N. Geyer, head of the Chicago Pure Milk Association, as late as last Sunday evening, with a view to acting as arbitrators in connection with this unfortunate affair. I was told that the Federal willingness to be of service to the people of Chicago was not accepted.

The general impression here appears to be that the matter is squarely up to Governor Horner and Mayor Kelly, and if they cannot bring about the orderly delivery of milk to the homes in Chicago when backed up by the National Guard of the State and the Chicago police department, then there is something radically wrong with the administration of justice in Illinois. If need be, a well-armed, stout-hearted Chicago motorcycle policeman should accompany every milk wagon into the city. The National Guard of the State is maintained at the taxpayers' expense for just such purposes and events as are now confronting Chicago. I hope it will not be necessary for the Federal Government to forcibly step into the situation in the interest of law and order.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I think the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia fully appreciate the efforts of the District Commissioners during the recess of Congress to formulate a bill for the regulation of the sale of liquor in the District. The members of the committee also feel that the District Commissioners have done a mighty fine job in the bill which they have presented to us. We also feel a debt of gratitude to Mr. Bride and Mr. West, corporation counsel and assistant corporation counsel of the District of Columbia.

This bill, we believe, is a workable proposition. It will make for sane and decent regulation. There are some things in the bill that may be too highly regulatory, and we can probably cure them on the floor, but from the experience we have had in the States which thus far have sold liquor, this is a decent and serviceable proposition.

Anybody who thinks there will not be evil attending the sale of liquor is just as stupid as those who thought you could stop the sale of liquor. No matter what system you take, there is going to be some evil attached to it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] makes much of the Democratic platform, which sought to effectively abolish the saloon and to bring the liquor traffic out into the open. That did not mean that the public of Washington had to line up on Pennsylvania Avenue and have a military officer pour out the liquor for him in Government tin cups, under the dispensary system. The Democratic platform did not mean anything like that at all. Under this bill the old-time saloon is abolished. The old-time saloon provided for sale for consumption on the premises and sale for consumption off the premises. One of the evils of the old-time saloon, which was often vividly portrayed by the drys, was the old family entrance, with a child, with holes in her stockings, hanging around the family entrance with a can for beer.

All those things are done away with. Here is a decent regulation. You have your hotels. You have your legitimate restaurants; you have your taverns for the sale of beer. Nobody need worry that the old-time saloon is possible under this bill.

In New York we have a law somewhat similar to this, and you do not find the old-time saloon in New York. We have been operating some time now under the new State act, since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

The suggestion in the Democratic platform that the liquor traffic be brought out into the open did not mean that everybody who wanted to drink had to drink in the open. It merely meant that the traffic was to be raised from the underworld; that the traffic was to be taken away from the racketeers; that the traffic was no longer to be a criminal traffic, but that the traffic was to be legal and licensed, so that everybody in the community could know who was in the traffic, what their characters were, and the traffic was to be surrounded by safeguards, so that a man who spent money to get a license and spent money to fit up his place would see to it that he himself rigorously observed the law so that he would not be punished summarily by having his license taken away and his business destroyed. That is all the Democratic platform meant. It did not mean these extravagant suggestions which my friend PATMAN indicates, that everybody in Washington who wanted to take a drink would have to drink in Garfinckel's window. It did not mean that at all. It merely meant the legitimate and sane regulation of the traffic that had been outlawed, had been restored to a legal standing, that was in the open as a legitimate business, and that is all it meant.

There may be some things in this bill that might be changed by the House, but taken all in all, it is the judgment of the Committee on the District of Columbia that this bill will work out to the satisfaction to the residents of the District.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 5 minutes.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would not support a measure that would bring back the saloon. If I thought for a minute that this bill would restore the saloon, I would vote against it. With that feeling I will not support a substitute that would perpetuate the speak-easy. That is what the dispensary system will do.

There is not a man here who understands conditions in the city of Washington who does not know that hundreds and hundreds of speakeasies have been open here since prohibition went into effect. I know it, and I am talking from experience, not hearsay evidence. Everyone who knows anything about Washington will say the same thing.

This bill was submittted to Congress by the 3 Commissioners, 2 appointees of President Roosevelt. The administration of the measure will prove whether it is a success or not. I happen to know the three Commissioners personally, and I know them so well that I am sure if it is possible to eliminate saloons and speak-easies in the city of Washington they will be eliminated.

The dispensary system is all wrong. Right over here in the neighboring county of Montgomery, in the State of Maryland, one pays $7 a quart for whisky in the dispensary, which can be purchased in Washington drug stores for $4.75; and this is not hearsay either. I speak from actual experience.

Do we want to have a fight between Montgomery County and the city of Washington and the State of Virginia over the price and sale of whisky? Nearby Virginia and Montgomery County, Md., have the dispensary system. That is why they want the dispensary system in Washington. They want their citizens to buy their whisky at home and want to prevent them from buying a drink in a Washington hotel.

In support of my contention that you can now buy whisky, legally in Washington from drug stores cheaper than you can from the Montgomery County, Md., dispensary which adjoins the city, I quote the prices of the dispensary from its price list. I only refer to bottled-in-bond whisky, as blended whisky does not interest me, but what is true of bottled in bond is true of blended goods:

Old Taylor (16 years), pint	$3.50
Old Granddad (16 years), pint	3.50
Old Reserve (16 years), pint	3.24

In Washington, in drug stores, you get Old Taylor in quarts for $5.25, Old Granddad for $5.25. I have no record of Old Reserve, but Gold Star, better than those quoted, can be bought for $4.75, as can Tom Harvey, and both are 16 years old. Gin is quoted at $4.75 in the Maryland dispensary, while the best of domestic gin sells for $2 in Washington drug stores.

I have a price list from Pennsylvania dispensaries, showing the cheapest bottled in bond at $6.50. All others quoted above that figure.

The dispensary prices equal the old bootleggers' prices.

Again, I say, do not perpetuate the speak-easy by providing for a dispensary system.

The saloon is more preferable than the speak-easy.

I told you this city is overrun with speak-easies, not only on the streets, but in office buildings.

You read from time to time of the killings in speak-easies. Just a few weeks ago a gangster, one of Washington's worst gunmen, was slain in one before the eyes of a hundred people and the killer has not been apprehended.

You must provide for a place, a legal place, for a man to get a drink who does not want liquor in his home. This bill reported by the committee makes this provision.

Pass this bill and have faith in Commissioners Hazen, Allen, and Gotwals to see that it is strictly enforced, which will mean the elimination of the saloon and a far worse evil—the speak-easy.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, there has been some talk here about the open saloon and violation of the Democratic platform. The Commissioners who drew this bill were appointed in the last 2 or 3 months by the President of the United States, the man who put the antisaloon plank in the Democratic platform. Certainly no one here will say that these men, having been appointed by the President, will arbitrarily as their first act as Commissioners of the District of Columbia violate the very platform promise made by the President. Let us get away from this idea. If this is in violation of the Democratic platform the President will not stand for it; for as my colleague from Virginia has stated, the President made a request of all Governors not to permit the open saloon. Is it reasonable to believe the President will sign a bill which violates his own request? So, there is no question but what the President knows the contents of this bill and is satisfied with it. Neither is there any question of there being an open saloon.

The eighteenth amendment was repealed in order that the American people might take a drink. How shall they have it, out in the open or in speak-easies and furnished rooms of rooming houses? What will happen if one is compelled to buy a pint or a quart of liquor every time he wants a drink, or if 4 or 5 men not individually having the price of a pint or a quart of liquor chip in their nickels and their dimes to get it and go back in the alley and drink it, or go into some dark back room about which the police know nothing?

Suppose you prohibit hotels and restaurants selling liquor and wines; what will happen? How will you control the liquor traffic? There is no limitation as to what you can buy under the so-called "dispensary system." If I have some friends who want a drink of liquor I buy a quart and take them to a hotel or restaurant. The proprietor is not charged with violating the law. I may get beastly drunk in that place and the proprietor cannot control it because he does not sell it.

On the other hand, if you permit the proprietor to sell liquor, the minute he or his agents or servants see a person taking a little more than he can carry he will say to whomever it may be: "You have enough; you cannot get any more." But what can the proprietor say to the man or woman who goes into his place and says, "I want a meal; give me some steaks"; who pulls out his flask and says, "Give me a bottle of ginger ale"; who sits there with his wife, or with a lady friend, and drinks that whole quart and then has to be taken out? How will you regulate such situations?

Mr. Chairman, what we want is regulation. The more regulation we have, the more temperance we will have. Let the police and the Commissioners of the District have control of the sale of liquor. If we are to have a dispensary system, as the gentleman from Ohio says, let us start with the distillery; let us control all the liquor in the country and then dispense it to each individual in the United States so much a week, maybe 2 ounces, maybe 3 ounces, or maybe a pint; and make it a violation of law if anyone consumes more than a specified quantity within the week, the month, or whatever period of time the law may prescribe. Then we shall have a real genuine dispensary system. But we must start at the distillery; we cannot start at the retail store. In Maryland we have had experience with the effort to limit sale and consumpion. There are nine Eastern Shore counties represented by the gentleman from Maryland, my colleague [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Of course, he had no part in formulating the law of 1914; but, to continue with my statement, the dry section of the Eastern Shore of Maryland insisted that a citizen be permitted to have a gallon a month. One of my friends from an Eastern Shore county whose name, I think, is Dodson, the son of a preacher, a dry gentleman, wanted to give the people of that district what they wanted, so he voted to give them a gallon a month each. In order to get this liquor they had to make an application and attach to it an affidavit. Finally this man found that apparently his father prescribed for somebody. Of course, it was not so; it was not his father's signature on the prescription; someone had forged his name. So my friend came to Annapolis the next year and asked for the repeal of the law. This is what you call "dry" sentiment.

People want to drink; drinking cannot be stopped, and prohibition has illustrated this. Let us give it to the people in the open. Let the police regulate it. Let us say to the man who handles it, the man who pays the $700 or $1,000 for a license, the hotel keeper, or whoever he may be, that he cannot sell to a person who is intoxicated. I have had experience in this matter. When I was 20 years of age my life was threatened because I would not sell to an intoxicated man. Nevertheless, he did not get the drink. Under the dispensary system there cannot be this restriction on drunkenness. If you say to the hotel or restaurant keepers, "We will take your license away from you if you violate the law", do you think those responsible for the operation of the Raleigh, the Washington, the Willard, the Mayflower, and similar hotels will violate the law?

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries", approved October 28, 1919, and all acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, insofar as they affect the manufacture, sale, and possession in the District of Columbia and the transportation in, into, and from the District of Columbia of alcoholic beverages upon which the Federal tax has been paid, are hereby repealed, with the exception of section 4 of title II of said act of Congress, approved October 28, 1919, insofar as it affects denatured alcohol and title III of said act.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section and to substitute in lieu thereof the provisions of H.R. 6148, which is the dispensary bill.

Mr. BLACK. I make a point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman, on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLACK. The point of order is that the amendment is not germane to the bill itself nor to the section just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not been reported as yet.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the reading of the amendment. It is a long amendment, and I believe everybody understands it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 1, strike out all of section 1 down to and including line 7 on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the provisions of H.R. 6148.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment in full is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as "The Alcoholic Beverage Act."

SEC. 2. The following terms, wherever used or referred to in this act, shall have the following meaning unless a different meaning clearly appears from the context:

(a) "Alcohol" shall mean the product known as ethyl or grain alcohol obtained by distillation of any fermented liquor, rectified either once or oftener, whatever may be the origin thereof, and shall include synthetic ethyl alcohol, but shall not include methyl alcohol and alcohol denatured in accordance with formulas approved by the Government of the United States; the word "alcohol" when used in the phrase "more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight" shall mean all alcohol whether obtained by distillation, fermentation, or otherwise;

(b) "Alcoholic beverages" shall include the four varieties of liquor defined herein as alcohol, spirits, wine, and beer, and any one or more of such varieties, and every liquid or solid, patented or not, containing alcohol, spirits, wine, or beer and capable of being consumed by a human being. Any liquid or solid containing more than 1 of the 4 varieties above defined shall be considered as belonging to that variety which has the higher percentage of alcohol however obtained, according to the order in which they are set forth in this subsection;

(c) "Beer" shall mean any beverage obtained by the alcoholic fermentation of an infusion or decoction of barley, malt, and hops, or of any similar products in drinkable water and containing, unless otherwise expressly provided, more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight; this definition shall include ale, porter, and stout;

(d) "Board" shall mean the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Board;

(e) "Bottle" shall mean any vessel intended to contain liquids and having a capacity of not more than 43 ounces;

(f) "Club" shall mean any nonprofit corporation or association which is the owner, lessee, or occupant of an establishment operated solely for objects of a national, social, patriotic, political, or athletic nature, or the like, but not for pecuniary gain, the advantages of which belong to all the members; it also shall mean the establishment so operated;

(g) "Dentist" shall mean any person duly authorized to practice dentistry pursuant to the laws of the District of Columbia;

(h) "Dining room" shall mean a public room in which full meals are regularly served;

(i) "Druggist" shall mean any person duly authorized to operate a pharmacy pursuant to the laws of the District of Columbia;

(j) "Establishment" shall mean any place where alcoholic beverages of one or more varieties are manufactured, sold, or used pursuant to the provisions of this act;

(k) "Government store" shall mean a store established by the board under this act for the sale of alcoholic beverages or any one or more varieties thereof;

(l) "Hotel" shall mean any duly licensed establishment, provided with special space and accommodation, where, in consideration of payment, food and lodging are habitually furnished to persons; and which has 10 or more bedrooms; it shall also mean the person who operates such hotel;

(m) "Interdicted person" shall mean a person to whom the sale of alcoholic liquor is prohibited by order pursuant to this act;

(n) "Intoxicated": Any person who has drunk enough alcoholic beverages to so affect his manner, disposition, speech, muscular movement, general appearance, or behavior, as to be apparent to observation, shall be deemed to be intoxicated;

(o) "Manager" shall mean the appointee of the board in charge of a Government store;

(p) "Member of a club" shall mean a person who maintains his membership in the said club by the payment of monthly, quarterly, or annual dues in the manner established by the rules and regulations thereof;

(q) "Package" shall mean any container, bottle, vessel, or other receptacle used for holding alcoholic beverages;

(r) "Person" shall include an individual, partnership, association, or corporation;

(s) "Physician" shall mean any person duly authorized to practice medicine pursuant to the laws of the District of Columbia;

(t) "Public place" shall mean any place, building, or conveyance to which the public has, or is permitted to have access, and any highway, street, lane, park, or place of public resort or amusement;

(u) "Residence" shall mean any building or part of a building or tent where a person resides, but does not include any part of a building which part is not actually and exclusively used as a private residence, nor any part of a hotel or club other than a private guest room thereof;

(v) "Restaurant" means any establishment, provided with special space and accommodation, where, in consideration of payment, food (without lodging) is habitually furnished to persons;

(w) "Sale" and "sell" shall include exchange, barter, and traffic, and any delivery made otherwise than gratuitously, by any means whatsoever, of alcoholic beverages, to solicit or receive an order for alcoholic beverages; to keep, offer, or expose the same for sale; to peddle;

(x) "Spirits" shall mean any beverage which contains alcohol obtained by distillation mixed with drinkable water and other substances in solution, and includes, among other things, brandy, rum, whisky, and gin; but shall not include any such liquors denatured in accordance with formulas approved by the United States;

(y) "Veterinary" shall mean any person duly authorized to practice veterinary science pursuant to the laws of the District of Columbia; and

(z) "Wine" shall mean any beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar, including honey and milk, either with or without additional sugar, and containing more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby created as an agency of the District of Columbia the District of Columbia Board of Alcoholic Beverage Control.

(b) The board shall consist of three members appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. One of the members of the board shall be appointed for a term of 1 year, one for a term of 3 years, and one for a term of 5 years; subsequent appointments shall be for a term of 5 years each, except appointments to fill vacancies which shall be for the unexpired terms. The Commissioners shall designate one of the members of the board chairman thereof. The board, under rules adopted by itself, may elect one of its members chairman, pro tempore, and another, or some other person, as secretary. Two members of the board shall constitute a quorum.

(c) Each member of the board shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

(d) Members of the board may be suspended or removed by the Commissioners at their pleasure.

(e) Each member of the board shall devote his full time to the performance of his official duties.

(f) No member, officer, agent, or employee of the board shall, directly or indirectly, individually, or as a member of a partnership, or of an association, or as a member or stockholder of a corporation, have any interest whatsoever in the manufacture of or in dealing in alcoholic beverages, or in any enterprise or industry in which alcoholic beverages are required, or receive any commission or profit whatsoever or have any interest whatsoever in the purchase or sale of alcoholic beverages by the board or by any other person whatsoever, or have any interest in or mortgage or deed or trust on any land or building where alcoholic beverages are manufactured for sale, kept for sale, offered for sale or sold, or any personal property used therein, or in any contract, other than his contract of employment, made with the board.

The provisions of this subsection shall not prevent any member, officer, agent, or employee of the board from purchasing and keeping in his possession, for the personal use of himself, members of his family, or guests, alcoholic beverages which may be purchased or kept by any person by virtue of this act.

SEC. 4. The functions, duties, and powers of the board shall be as follows:

(a) To buy, import, and sell alcoholic beverages, other than beer, and to have alcoholic beverages in its possession for sale;

(b) To control the possession, sale, transportation, and delivery of alcoholic beverages by the board;

(c) To determine the localities within which Government stores shall be established and operated and the location of such stores;

(d) To make provision for the maintenance of warehouses for alcoholic beverages and to control the delivery of alcoholic beverages to and from such warehouses, and the keeping of the same therein;

(e) To lease, occupy, and improve any land or building required for the purpose of this act;

(f) With the consent of the Congress to purchase or otherwise acquire title to any land or building required for the purposes of this act and to sell the same;

(g) To purchase, lease, or acquire the use by any manner whatsoever of any plant or equipment which may be considered necessary or useful in carrying into effect the purposes of this act, including rectifying, blending, and processing plants, but not manufacturing plants;

(h) To determine the nature, form, and capacity of all packages to be used for containing alcoholic beverages to be kept or sold under this act and to prescribe the form and contents of all labels and seals to be placed thereon;

(i) To appoint every officer, agent, and employee required for its operations, dismiss them, fix their salaries or remuneration, assign them their official positions and titles, define their respective duties and powers, require them or any of them to give bonds payable to the United States in such penalty as shall be fixed by the board, and engage the services of experts and of persons engaged in the practice of a profession; all salaries or remuneration in excess of $1,000 per annum shall first be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; members, officers, agents, and employees of the board are authorized and empowered to arrest persons for any disorderly conduct in or about any Government stores or property of the board or for violations of the provisions of this act committed in their absence;

(j) To hold and conduct hearings, to issue subpenas requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of records, memoranda, papers, and other documents before the board of any officer or agent thereof, and to administer oaths and to take testimony thereunder; in its discretion to authorize any member, officer, or agent of the board to hold and conduct hearings, issue subpenas, and administer oaths and take testimony thereunder; and

(k) Generally to do all such things as may be deemed necessary or advisable by the board for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. (a) The board may from time to time make such regulations not inconsistent with this act as the board shall deem necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act, and from time to time alter, repeal, or amend such regulations or any of them. Such regulations shall be published at least once in some newspaper published in the District of Columbia and in any other manner which the board may deem advisable, and upon being so published shall have the force and effect of law.

(b) Prima facie evidence of any such regulation may be given in all courts and proceedings by the production of what purports to be an officially printed copy of such regulation, alteration, repeal, or amendment.

SEC. 6. (a) No member of the board may be sued civilly for doing or omitting to do any act in the performance of his duties as prescribed by this act, except by the United States.

(b) The board may in the name of the United States of America at the relation of the District of Columbia alcoholic beverage control board be sued in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to enforce any contract made by the board or to recover damages for any breach thereof and may defend such proceedings and may institute proceedings in any court. No such proceedings shall be taken against, or in the names of, the members of the board.

SEC. 7. (a) The board shall from time to time make reports to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia covering such matters in connection with the administration and enforcement of this act as they may require, and shall annually make to the said Commissioners a report for the 12 months ending on the 30th day of June in the year in which the report is made, which shall contain:

(1) A statement of the nature and amount of the business transacted by each Government store under this act during the year;

(2) A statement of the assets and liabilities of the board, including a profit-and-loss account, and such other accounts and matters as may be necessary to show the result of the operations of the board for the year; and

(3) A statement showing the taxes collected under this act during the year.

(b) The books and records of the board shall at all times be subject to examination and audit by the Auditor of Public Accounts and such agency as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate.

SEC. 8. The board shall keep such complete and accurate records as shall be necessary to show:

(1) All moneys received by the board;

(2) All disbursements of money made by the board;

(3) The amount of money on deposit and on hand;

(4) The security given the board by depositories of the board;

(5) The kinds and amounts of alcoholic beverages on hand and the location thereof;

(6) All indebtedness and all contracts of the board;

(7) All receipts from and costs and expenses incurred for and on behalf of each Government store; and

(8) All real estate owned or leased and all real estate sold by the board.

SEC. 9. (a) The board may establish, maintain, and operate in such locations as shall be considered advisable by the board, Government stores for the sale of alcoholic beverages, other than beer, in accordance with the provisions of this act and may discontinue any such store or stores when in its discretion it is advisable to do so.

(b) The board shall, from time to time, fix the prices at which the various classes, varieties, and brands of alcoholic beverages shall be sold in such stores.

(c) The sale of alcoholic beverages at each Government store shall be conducted by a manager, and by such other officers, agents, and employees as may be appointed hereunder, who shall, under the direction of the board, be responsible for the carrying out of the provisions of this act and the regulations of the board insofar as they relate to the conduct of such store and the sale of alcoholic beverages thereat.

(d) No alcoholic beverages shall be sold in a Government store except in a closed package, sealed and containing such label as the board shall prescribe.

(e) No alcoholic beverages shall be consumed in a Government store by any person.

(f) No more than 1 gallon of alcohol or spirits shall be sold to any one person at any one time in any Government store; this provision shall not limit the amount that may be sold by the board in Government stores or otherwise for industrial purposes and to druggists licensed under this act.

(g) The board may from time to time adopt regulations relating to the sale, delivery, and shipment of alcoholic beverages, and alter, amend, or repeal the same in order to prevent the unlawful sale and delivery thereof in and from Government stores.

SEC. 10. (a) Every order of the board for the purchase of alcoholic beverages shall be authenticated by the chairman of the board or by a member of the board authorized by the board to authenticate such orders, and no order shall be binding unless so authenticated.

(b) A duplicate of every such order shall be kept on file in the office of the board.

(c) All cancelations of orders made by the board shall be authenticated in the same manner and a duplicate thereof kept as herein provided.

SEC. 11. No sale or delivery of alcoholic beverages shall be made at any Government store, nor shall any such store be kept open for the sale of alcoholic beverages—

(a) On Sunday;

(b) On any public holiday fixed pursuant to the provisions of the laws of the District of Columbia;

(c) During such other periods and on such other days as the board may direct.

SEC. 12. (a) All moneys received by the board from the sale of alcoholic beverages and from license taxes shall be deposited by the board in such bank or banks or trust company or trust companies as shall be designated by the board.

(b) All disbursements of moneys so deposited by the board shall be by check, draft, or other order signed by the secretary of the board, and countersigned by the chairman or another member of the board designated by the board, or by some officer or agent of the board authorized and designated by the board for such purpose.

SEC. 13. The board shall make all payments necessary for the administration of this act, including the payment of the salaries and remuneration of the members, officers, agents, and employees of the board, and all costs and expenses incurred in establishing and maintaining Government stores and in the administration of this act.

SEC. 14. (a) The accounts of the board shall be made up to and including the 31st day of March, the 30th day of June, the 30th day of September, and the 31st day of December in each year and at such other times as may be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and in every case the board shall prepare a balance sheet and statement of profit and loss and submit the same to the said Commissioners.

SEC. 15. The net profits derived by the board under the provisions of this act shall, after deducting therefrom such sums as may be allowed the board by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the creation of a reserve fund to meet any losses that may be incurred by the board in connection with the administration of this act and to provide for the depreciation on the buildings, plant, and equipment owned, held, or operated by the board, be paid by the board into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia, quarterly, within 30 days after the close of each quarter.

SEC. 16. The board may grant the following licenses under the provisions of this act:

(a) Distillers' licenses, which shall authorize the licensees to manufacture alcoholic beverages other than wine and beer, and to sell and deliver or ship the same in accordance with regulations of the board, in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers to the board and to persons outside of the District of Columbia for resale outside of the District of Columbia, except that no deliveries or shipments shall be made into any State the laws of which prohibit the consignee from receiving or selling the same.

(b) Winery licenses, which shall authorize the licensees to manufacture wines and to sell and deliver or ship the same in accordance with regulations of the board, in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers to the board, to persons outside of the District of Columbia, for resale outside of the District of Columbia, except that no deliveries or shipments shall be made into any State the laws of which prohibit the consignee from receiving or selling the same.

(c) Brewery licenses, which shall authorize the licensees to manufacture beer and to sell and deliver or ship the same, in accordance with regulations of the board, in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers to the board, to persons licensed under the provisions of this act to sell the same at wholesale or retail for the purpose of resale, and to persons outside of the District of Columbia for resale outside of the District of Columbia, except that no deliveries or shipments shall be made into any State the laws of which prohibit the consignee from receiving or selling the same.

(d) Bottlers' licenses, which shall authorize the licensees to acquire and receive deliveries and shipments of beer in barrels or other closed containers and to bottle, sell, and deliver or ship the same, in accordance with regulations of the board, to the board, to persons licensed under the provisions of this act to sell the same at wholesale or retail for the purpose of resale, and to persons outside of the District of Columbia for resale outside of the District of Columbia, except that no deliveries or shipments shall be made into any State the laws of which prohibit the consignee from receiving or selling the same.

(e) Wholesale beer licenses, which shall authorize the licensee to acquire and receive deliveries and shipments of beer and to sell and deliver or ship the same, in accordance with regulations of the board, in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers to the board, to persons licensed under the provisions of this act to sell the same at retail, for the purpose of resale, and to persons outside of the District of Columbia, for resale outside of the District of Columbia, except that no deliveries or shipments shall be made into any State the laws of which prohibit the consignee from receiving or selling the same.

(f) Retail on-premises wine and beer licenses to—

(1) Hotels, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell wine and beer in dining rooms and other designated rooms thereof, either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such rooms or in private guest rooms thereof;

(2) Restaurants, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell wine and beer in the dining rooms thereof, either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such dining rooms;

(3) Clubs, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell wine and beer in the dining rooms, and other designated rooms thereof, either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such rooms or in private guest rooms thereof.

(g) Retail on-premises beer licenses to—

(1) Hotels, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell beer in the dining rooms and other designated rooms thereof either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such rooms or in private guest rooms thereof;

(2) Restaurants, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell beer in dining rooms thereof, either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such dining rooms;

(3) Clubs, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell beer in the dining rooms and other designated rooms thereof, either with or without meals, for consumption on the premises only in such rooms or in private guest rooms thereof.

(h) Retail off-premises wine and beer licenses which shall authorize the licensees to sell wine and beer at retail only in closed packages for consumption off the premises of such licensees and to deliver or ship the same to the purchasers thereof, in accordance with regulation of the board.

(i) Druggists' licenses to druggists, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell alcoholic beverages upon prescriptions as provided in section 27 of this act.

(j) Banquet licenses to persons in charge of banquets, which licenses shall authorize the licensees to sell wine and beer in designated rooms for consumption on the premises; a separate license shall be required for each banquet, but no such license shall be required of any hotel, restaurant, or club holding a retail wine and beer license issued under the provisions of this act.

(k) The term "designated rooms" as used in this section shall mean rooms approved by the board for particular licensees.

SEC. 17. (a) Every person intending to apply for any license provided for under the provisions of this act, except banquet licenses, shall, not more than 30 days and not less than 10 days before applying to the board for such license, post a notice of such intention on the front door of the building, place, or room where he proposes to engage in such business and publish a copy of such notice at least once in a newspaper published in or having a general circulation in the District of Columbia.

(b) Every person desiring a license under the provisions of this act shall, after publishing notice of his intention as provided in subsection (a) of this section, file with the board an application therefor on forms provided by the board and a statement in writing and under oath setting forth such information as the board shall require.

SEC. 18. (a) The board shall refuse to grant any license mentioned in this act if it shall be of the opinion—

(1) That the applicant is not a suitable person to be so licensed;

(2) That the place to be occupied by the applicant is not a suitable place;

(3) That a sufficient number of licenses have already been issued; or

(4) That the license should not be issued.

(b) The board shall not issue any license until the license tax required by section 20 of this act is paid to the board.

(c) The action of the board in granting or in refusing to grant any license under the provisions of this act shall not be subject to review by any court, nor shall any mandamus or injunction lie in any such case.

SEC. 19. (a) No retail on-premises wine and beer license, retail on-premises beer license, retail off-premises wine and beer license, druggist's license, or banquet license shall be issued to any manufacturer, bottler, or wholesaler of alcoholic beverages, whether licensed in the District of Columbia or not, nor to any officer or director of any such manufacturer, bottler, or wholesaler, nor to any partnership, association, or corporation, any partner, member, or stockholder of which is an officer or director of any such manufacturer, bottler, or wholesaler.

SEC. 20. (a) The taxes on licenses issued pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be as follows:

(1) For each distiller's license, if to manufacture not in excess of 500 gallons of alcohol or spirits or both during the year in which the license is issued, $100, and if to manufacture more than 500 gallons during each year, $1,000 per annum;

(2) For each winery license, $1,000 per annum;

(3) For each brewery license, $1,000 per annum;

(4) For each bottler's license, $500 per annum;

(5) For each wholesale beer license, $250 per annum;

(6) For each retail on-premises wine and beer license to a hotel, restaurant, or club, $200 per annum;

(7) For each retail on-premises beer license to a hotel, restaurant, or club, $100 per annum;

(8) For each retail off-premises wine and beer license, $50 per annum;

(9) For each druggist license, $10 per annum; and

(10) For each banquet license, $5.

(b) All licenses issued pursuant to this act shall expire on the 31st day of December next following the date of issuance.

(c) The tax on each such license shall be subject to proration to the following extent: If the license is issued in the second quarter of any year, the tax shall be decreased by one fourth; if issued in the third quarter of any year, the tax shall be decreased by one half; and if in the fourth quarter of any year, the tax shall be decreased by three fourths.

Any licensee who obtains a license and pays the tax prescribed under the provisions of this section shall be exonerated from obtaining the license or paying the tax prescribed in the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes", approved April 5, 1933; and the license obtained under the provisions of this act shall likewise entitle the holder thereof to dispense the beverages prescribed in said act approved April 5, 1933.

SEC. 21. (a) Each license issued by the board under the provisions of this act shall designate the place where the business of the licensee will be carried on. A separate license shall be required for each separate place of business.

(b) No such license shall be transferable from one person to another but may be amended to show a change in the place of business.

(c) Each license shall be kept posted in a conspicuous place by the licensee at the place where he carries on the business for which the license is issued.

SEC. 22. The board shall prescribe by regulations, which it may from time to time alter, amend, or cancel, between what hours and on what days wine and beer shall not be sold by persons licensed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 23. The board may cancel any licenses issued by it if it shall be of the opinion—

(1) That the licensee is not a suitable person to hold such license;

(2) That the place occupied by the licensee is not a suitable place;

(3) That the number of licenses issued should be reduced; or

(4) That the license should be revoked.

SEC. 24. (a) There is hereby levied on all beer manufactured in the District of Columbia an excise tax at the rate of $1 per barrel of 31 gallons, and a like rate for any fair part thereof. Such tax shall be paid by the person who manufactures the said beer.

(b) There is hereby levied on all beer bottled in the District of Columbia and on all beer sold in the District of Columbia an excise tax at the rate of $1 per barrel of 31 gallons, and a like rate for any fair part thereof. The tax herein levied shall be paid by the respective bottlers and wholesalers of the said beer. No such tax shall be collected upon any beer bottled or sold in the District of Columbia when the excise tax provided for in this act shall have been previously levied and paid thereon in full; but if on beer bottled in the District of Columbia there shall have been paid by the manufacturer the excise tax herein levied on beer manufactured in the District of Columbia, such bottler shall pay all additional excise taxes which may be due on such beer in bottled form.

(c) When any person shall sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia any beer purchased or obtained from any person not licensed either as a brewery, bottler, or wholesaler under the provisions of this act, and on which the excise tax herein levied has not been paid, such person shall pay the tax levied in the preceding subsection.

SEC. 25. (a) Every person who is licensed in the District of Columbia to manufacture, to bottle, or to sell at wholesale any alcoholic beverages shall keep a complete and accurate record of all alcoholic beverages manufactured, bottled, and/or sold by him. Such records shall show the quantities of all such alcoholic beverages manufactured and/or bottled by him, the dates of all sales and deliveries or shipments, the names and addresses of all persons to whom sales and deliveries or shipments are made, the quantities and kinds of alcoholic beverages sold and delivered or shipped and the prices charged therefor.

(b) Every person licensed to sell at retail any alcoholic beverages shall keep a complete and accurate record of all purchases thereof, the dates of such purchase, the kinds and quantities of alcoholic beverages purchased, the prices charged such licensee therefor, and the names and addresses of the persons from whom purchased. Every such licensee shall also preserve all invoices showing his purchases. He shall also keep an accurate account of daily sales, showing quantities of alcoholic beverages sold and the total price charged by him therefor; such account need not give the names or addresses of the purchasers thereof.

(c) All such records, invoices, and accounts shall at all times be open to inspection by the board and any person or persons that may be designated as its agent.

(d) The board and the agents duly authorized by it shall at all times be allowed free access during business hours to every place where alcoholic beverages are manufactured, bottled, stored, offered for sale, or sold, for the purpose of examining and inspecting such place and all records, invoices, and accounts therein.

SEC. 26. The provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent nor to require any person to be licensed under the provisions of this act to engage in—

(a) The manufacture, sale, and delivery or shipment by persons authorized under existing laws to engage in such business of any medicine containing sufficient medication to prevent the same being used as a beverage.

(b) The manufacture, sale, and delivery or shipment by persons authorized under existing laws to engage in such business of any medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia and national formulary patent and proprietary preparations, and other bona fide medicinal and technical preparations, which contain no more alcohol than is necessary to extract the medicinal properties of the drugs contained in such preparations, and no more alcohol than is necessary to hold the medicinal agents in solution and to preserve the same, and which are manufactured and sold to be used exclusively as medicine and not as beverages.

(c) The manufacture, sale, and delivery or shipment of toilet, medicinal, and antiseptic preparations and solutions not intended for internal human use nor to be sold as beverages.

(d) The manufacture and sale of food products known as "flavoring extracts" which shall be so manufactured and sold for cooking and culinary purposes only and not to be sold for beverage purposes.

(e) The Board may by regulations, which it may from time to time alter, amend, or repeal, permit the manufacture, sale, delivery, and shipment of "Sterno" canned heats and other similar substances without requiring a license therefor.

SEC. 27. Except as otherwise provided in section 26 of this act, persons holding druggists' licenses issued under the provisions of this act shall sell alcoholic beverages only for medicinal purposes, and then only upon a written prescription of a physician, setting forth the name and address of the person for whom prescribed, the kind and quantity of alcoholic beverages prescribed.

Each druggist shall preserve, separate from other prescriptions, for a period of 2 years from the date filled, all prescriptions for alcoholic beverages filled by him. Such prescriptions shall at all times be open to the inspection of the board and of any duly authorized agent thereof.

SEC. 28. (a) A physician may administer alcoholic beverages to a bone fide patient in cases of actual need when in the judgment of the physician the use of alcoholic beverages is necessary.

(b) A dentist who deems it necessary that a bona fide patient being then under treatment by him is in actual need of and should be supplied with alcoholic beverages as a stimulant or restorative, may administer to the patient alcoholic beverages.

(c) A veterinary who deems it necessary may, in the course of his practice, administer or cause to be administered alcoholic beverages to a dumb animal.

(d) A person in charge of an institution regularly conducted as a hospital or sanatorium for the care of persons in ill health, or as a home devoted exclusively to the care of aged people, may administer, or cause to be administered, alcoholic beverages to any bona fide patient or inmate of the institution who is in need of the same, either by way of external application or otherwise for emergency medicinal purposes, and may charge for the alcoholic beverages so administered.

SEC. 29. (a) When, after hearing upon due notice, it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or any judge thereof in vacation, that any person, resident or sojourning within the District of Columbia, has, on or after the day on which this act becomes effective, been convicted of driving or running an automobile, car, truck, motorcycle, engine, or train while intoxicated or has shown himself to be an improper person to be allowed to purchase alcoholic beverages, the court or the judge thereof in vacation may make an order of interdiction prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages to such person until further ordered. The court or judge entering any such order shall cause a copy of the same to be forthwith filed with the board.

(b) Upon any such order being filed with the board, the board shall forthwith notify, in such manner as it may provide by its regulations, the interdicted person, the managers of the Government stores and all persons licensed under the provisions of this act to sell alcoholic beverages at retail, of such order. It shall thereafter as long as such order shall remain in effect be unlawful for anyone to sell alcoholic beverages to such interdicted person except in accordance with the provisions of sections 26, 27, and 28 of this act.

(c) The board, court, or judge entering any order of interdiction may thereafter at any time alter, amend, or cancel the same as in its judgment it shall deem proper. A copy of each such alteration, amendment, and cancelation shall be filed with the board and notice thereof given by the board as hereinafter provided as to orders of interdiction.

(d) Any hearing or investigation under this section by any court or judge may be held in private if the court or judge shall so direct.

SEC. 30. All alcoholic beverages and materials used in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages and containers in which alcoholic beverages are manufactured, kept, stored, possessed, sold, or in any manner used in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be deemed contraband and shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 31. If there be complaint on oath that alcoholic beverages are being manufactured, sold, kept, stored, or in any manner held, used, or concealed in a particular house or other place in violation of law, the proper officer charged with the duty of issuing search warrants, to whom such complaint is made, if satisfied that there is reasonable cause for such belief, shall issue a warrant to search such house or other place for alcoholic beverages. Such warrants, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be issued, directed, and executed in accordance with existing general laws.

SEC. 32. All proceedings for the confiscation of articles declared contraband and forfeited under this act shall be proceeded against as provided by existing law in the case of confiscated and contraband articles.

SEC. 33. (a) Except as otherwise provided in section 26 of this act, if any person shall manufacture in the District of Columbia alcoholic beverages without being licensed under the provisions of this act to manufacture such alcoholic beverages, or if any person other than one who holds a brewery license or a bottler's license, under the provisions of this act shall bottle beer for sale, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

(b) Every person found at any distillery, winery, or brewery where alcoholic beverages are being manufactured in violation of the provisions of this act shall be deemed prima facie guilty of manufacturing the same or aiding and abetting in such manufacture and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as if personally manufacturing the same.

SEC. 34. If any person who is not licensed under the provisions of this act to sell alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia shall sell any alcoholic beverages other than permitted by the provisions of this act, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 35. If any person who holds a license issued under the provisions of this act—

(a) shall sell any alcoholic beverages of a kind other than that which such license or this act authorizes him to sell; or

(b) shall sell beer to which wine, spirits, or alcohol, or more than one of any such alcoholic beverages, has been added; or

(c) shall sell wine to which spirits or alcohol, or both, have been added, otherwise than as required in the manufacture thereof under regulations of the board; or

(d) shall sell alcoholic beverages of a kind which such license or this act authorizes him to sell, but to any person other than to those to whom such license or this act authorizes him to sell; or

(e) shall sell alcoholic beverages which such license or this act authorizes him to sell, but in any place or in any manner other than such license of this act authorizes him to sell; or

(f) shall sell any alcoholic beverages when forbidden by the provisions of this act; or

(g) shall keep or allow to be kept other than in his residence and for his personal use, any alcoholic beverage, other than that which he is authorized to sell by such license, or by this act, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 36. If any person shall, except pursuant to the provisions of sections 26, 27, and 28 of this act, sell any alcoholic beverages—

(a) to any person less than 18 years of age; or

(b) to any interdicted person; or

(c) to any person who is intoxicated; or

(d) to any patient under the supervision or control of any District or State hospital, whether such patient be on furlough or otherwise, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 37. If any person licensed under the provisions of this act to sell wine at retail shall sell any wine not purchased from the board, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 38. Any person licensed under the provisions of this act who shall fail or refuse to pay any excise tax provided for in section 24 of this act, or shall fail or refuse to deliver, keep, and preserve such records, invoices, and accounts as required by section 25 of this act, or shall fail or refuse to allow such records, invoices, and accounts or his place of business to be examined and inspected as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 39. If any person shall for any purpose whatsoever mix or permit or cause to be mixed with any alcoholic beverages kept for sale, sold, or supplied by him as a beverage any drug, or any form of methol alcohol, or any crude, unrectified or impure form of ethol, alcohol, or any other deleterious substance or liquid, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 40. If any person shall advertise in or send any advertising matter into the District, except in accordance with rules and regulations of the board, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 41. If any person shall buy alcoholic beverages from any person other than a Government store or some person authorized under the provisions of this act to sell the same, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 42. If any person, other than a common carrier, shall have, possess, keep, carry, ship, or transport alcoholic beverages, which are acquired by such person or any person for whom he is acting in violation of the provision of this act, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 43. If any person shall while intoxicated be at or in any public place, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 44. (a) If any person shall take a drink of alcoholic beverages or shall offer a drink of alcoholic beverages to another, whether accepted or not, at or in any public place, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

(b) This section shall not prevent any person from drinking alcoholic beverages or offering a drink of alcoholic beverages to another in the dining room or other designated room, as defined in section 16 of this act, of a hotel, restaurant, or club, provided such hotel, restaurant, or club, or the person who operates the same, is licensed to sell for consumption in such dining room, or room, such alcoholic beverages and the alcoholic beverages drunk or offered were purchased therein.

SEC. 45. (a) If any manufacturer, bottler, or wholesaler of alcoholic beverages, whether licensed in the District or not, or any officer or director of any such manufacturer, bottler, or wholesaler shall have any financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business for which any retail license is issued, under the provisions of this act, or in the premises where the business of any person to whom any such retail license has been issued is conducted, or either directly or indirectly shall rent, lend, or give to any person who holds any retail license issued under the provisions of this act, or to the owner of the premises on which the business of any such person so licensed is conducted any money, equipment, furniture, fixtures, or property with which the business of such retailer is or may be conducted, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

(b) If any person licensed hereunder to sell at retail any alcoholic beverages shall consent to any violation of this section, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 46. If any member, officer, agent, or employee of the board shall be directly or indirectly interested or engaged in any other business or undertaking dealing in alcoholic beverages, whether as owner, part owner, partner, member of syndicate, shareholder, agent, or employee and whether for his own benefit or in a fiduciary capacity for some other person or if any member, officer, agent, or employee of the board of any employee of the District shall solicit or receive, directly or indirectly, any commission, remuneration, or gift whatsoever from any person or corporation having sold, selling, or offering alcoholic beverages for sale to the Board in pursuance of this act, or if any person selling or offering for sale to, or purchasing alcoholic beverages from the board shall either, directly or indirectly, offer to pay or pay any commission, profit, or remuneration, or make any gift to any member, officer, agent, or employee of the board, or to anyone on behalf of any such member, officer, agent, or employee, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 47. If any person shall unlawfully manufacture, transport, or sell any alcoholic beverages, as herein defined, and at the time of such unlawful manufacturing, transporting, or selling, or aiding or assisting in any manner in such act, shall carry on or about his person, or have on or in any vehicle which he may be using to aid him in any such purpose, or have in his possession, actual or constructive, at or within 100 yards of any place where any such alcoholic beverages is being unlawfully manufactured, transported, or sold, any firearm, dirk, bowie knife, razor, slingshot, metal knucks, or any weapons of like kind, he shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years, or, in the discretion of the court, confined in the jail for not less than 6 months nor more than 12 months.

SEC. 48. (a) No alcoholic beverages other than wines or beer shall be imported, shipped, transported, or brought into the District unless the same be consigned to the board; the board may, however, permit such alcoholic beverages ordered by it from without the District for persons for industrial purposes or for druggists to be shipped or transported direct to such persons.

(b) No wine shall be imported, shipped, transported, or brought into the District unless the same be consigned to the board; the board may, however, permit wine ordered by it from without the District for persons licensed under this act to sell the same at retail to be shipped or transported direct to such persons for purposes of resale.

(c) No beer shall be imported, shipped, transported, or brought into the District except to the board or to persons licensed under the provisions of this act to sell the same.

SEC. 49. It shall be unlawful for any person to attempt to do any of the things prohibited by this act or to aid or abet another in doing, or attempting to do, any of the things prohibited by this act.

On an indictment, information, or warrant for the violation of any provision of this act the jury of the court trying the case without a jury may find the defendant guilty of an attempt, or of being an accessory, and the punishment shall be the same as if the defendant were solely guilty of such violation.

SEC. 50. No action to recover the price of any alcoholic beverages sold in contravention of the provisions of this act may be maintained.

SEC. 51. The provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent—

(a) Any person from keeping and possessing alcoholic beverages in his residence for the personal use of himself, his family, his servants, or his guests if such alcoholic beverages shall have been lawfully acquired by him, nor to prevent such person, his family, or servants from giving or serving such alcoholic beverages to guests in the said residence when such gift or service is in no wise a shift or device to evade the provisions of this act;

(b) Any club licensed under the provisions of this act from keeping for members of such club alcoholic beverages lawfully acquired by such members, provided such alcoholic beverages shall not be sold, dispensed, or given away in violation of any provision of this act.

SEC. 52. (a) Any person convicted of a misdemeanor under the provisions of this act, or convicted of violating any other provision of this act, or convicted of violating any regulation made by the board under the provisions of this act, shall, unless otherwise provided, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or confinement in jail not exceeding 12 months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

(b) In addition to the penalties imposed by this act for violations thereof, any court before whom any person is convicted of violating any provision of this act, may require such defendant to execute bond, with approved security, in the penalty of not more than $1,000, conditioned that the said defendant will not violate any of the provisions of this act for the term of 1 year. If any such bond be required and be not given, the defendant shall be committed to jail until it is given, or until he is discharged by the court, provided he shall not be confined therefor for a longer period than 6 months. If any such bond required by a court be not given during the term of the court by which conviction is had, it may be given before the judge thereof in vacation or before the clerk of the said court.

(c) The provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent the board from canceling the license of any person convicted of violating any provisions of this act.

SEC. 53. No person shall be excused from testifying for the prosecution as to any offense committed by another under this act by reason of his testimony tending to incriminate himself, but the testimony given by such person when called to the stand by the prosecution shall in no case be used against him, nor shall he be prosecuted as to the offense as to which he testifies.

SEC. 54. The provisions of this act shall not apply to the manufacture, bottling, selling, offering for sale, distributing, carrying, shipping, transporting, possession, drinking, using, advertising, and dispensing in the District of Columbia of beer, lager beer, ale, porter, wine, similar fermented malt or vinous liquor, and fruit juice containing not more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight.

SEC. 55. For the purpose of paying the salaries and remuneration of the members, officers, agents, and employees of the board, and all costs and expenses incurred by the board in establishing and maintaining Government stores, and in the administration of the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be paid out on checks issued on vouchers signed by the secretary of the board and countersigned by the chairman or other member of the board designated by the board, or by some officer or agent of the board authorized and designated by the board for such purpose.

SEC. 56. If any part or parts, section, subsection, sentence, clause, or phrase of this act is for any reason declared unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining parts of this act which shall remain in force as if such act had been passed with the unconstitutional part or parts, section, subsection, sentence, clause, or phrase thereof eliminated.

All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill or to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. After the gentleman from New York concludes, I want to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. The bill sought to be passed here and which is desired to be amended by the gentleman from Virginia sets up a regulation in connection with the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] contains a plan by which the Government, through the District of Columbia and a board of the District of Columbia, will actually engage itself, and for profit, in the liquor business. It provides that the board may lease suitable buildings. It provides that the board must keep books of account covering the sale and purchase of liquor. It provides that liquor in the first instance may only be sold by the board and that the board may be the only wholesaler in the District of Columbia. It provides for Government stores in the District of Columbia. This is a far different proposition than the one set forth in the bill reported by the committee, which contains no element at all of governmental ownership, governmental sale, or Government stores. The bill proposed by the committee is purely a bill to regulate a strictly private business.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Instead of being an amendment to the bill that is now before the Committee, this is, as a matter of fact, a completely new law, entirely different in its provisions.

Mr. BLACK. An entirely new theory. I also believe it would be outside of the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia Committee to originally hear and function on such a proposal. This is so far-reaching that it is beyond the power of the District of Columbia Committee to even consider originally. It is an entirely new element in our governmental system in this country. All we seek to do is the ordinary thing by a bill to regulate a strictly private business; that is, set up taxes for a strictly private business, provide licenses, and provide penal provisions. But the amendment suggests the absolute entry of the Government of the United States into a private business—something the Government has not done heretofore. The suggested amendment sets up a Government board or agency with power to buy and sell liquor and with power to lease, which is entirely different from the simple proposition reported by the District of Columbia Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer, as has been said by the gentleman from New York, quite frankly undertakes to substitute H.R. 6148, which is the dispensary bill, for H.R. 6181, which is the committee bill.

It is my purpose, if the Chair holds my amendment germane, and it should be adopted by the Committee, to move to strike out all subsequent paragraphs of the pending bill.

The purpose of this bill is to provide a system for liquor control in the District of Columbia. There are two systems of liquor control. One is the system that is advocated by the District of Columbia Committee, and the other is the dispensary system advocated by myself and numerous other Members. The only difference is the method of control. There is no difference in the fundamental purpose of the legislation, because that fundamental purpose is present in both bills, namely, to provide an adequate system of control. The only difference is the difference of opinion between the gentlemen on the two sides of the question as to which method is preferable to accomplish the objects sought. If you will take the two bills, Mr. Chairman, and lay them side by side, you will find that until you get down to the feature providing for the dispensary system, these two bills are almost identical in their language and that the definitions are the same. You may take paragraph after paragraph of the committee bill and compare them with paragraph after paragraph of my bill, and you will find that they are almost similar word for word.

The only difference between the two bills is in the method of accomplishing the same object. Both bills have for their ultimate purpose the accomplishment of the same object.

I respectfully submit that the amendment is germane, and should the Chair disagree with me and rule that the matter is not germane, I will then move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill and ask for a vote on the question for the purpose of testing the sentiment of the House as to whether they want the dispensary system or the system advocated by the District of Columbia Committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is not prepared to rule, I would like to be heard very briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, without entering upon the question of the merits or demerits of the proposed amendment—and I may say very frankly that if this matter is submitted to the House I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia—I am deeply and profoundly interested in undertaking to preserve, so far as possible, the continuity of the decisions of the House of Representatives.

As one who has endeavored to give matters of this nature some earnest consideration over a course of years, and as one who recognizes, I believe, the supreme importance of undertaking to preserve and make continuous and consistent the decisions and precedents of the House, I may say to the Chair very frankly, in my opinion, despite my personal views on this question, that the point of order is well taken.

I am not going to undertake to cite a long line of decisions on this proposition. I feel that if the parliamentarian has made an investigation of this particular problem, as no doubt he has, he can furnish the Chair with decisions identical with the one now presented by the pending point of order.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a decision made by the present Speaker of the House on April 13, 1933, in which this same question was involved.

The parliamentary philosophy of this point, Mr. Chairman, is that while the committee bill and the proposed substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] seek to effectuate the same general purpose, to wit, the control of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, yet if the Chair will give consideration to the respective proposals, the Chair will find that the methods of controlling the proposition as offered in the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia are entirely different, and it is upon that particular phase of the parliamentary question that Speaker RAINEY made this decision. At page 1679 of the RECORD of the date I have suggested the Speaker said:

> The question presented has been passed upon two or three times and presents nothing new. The bill under consideration provides a method of farm relief, essentially by the issuance of bonds, to be marketed in the ordinary way. The Frazier bill, which is the subject of the motion to recommit, provides also for farm relief, also for bond issues, and in addition to that provides a method of meeting the bond issues by currency printed and issued, clearly inflation, which may amount to as much as three and one half billion dollars. The two methods are as wide apart as the poles.

I shall not read all of the decision. The Chair may have it before him. The Speaker concludes with this statement:

> The Chair feels he cannot ignore the precedents he has cited, and he might add that he could call attention to a number of others. The Chair wants it distinctly understood that he is not passing upon the propriety of inflating the currency. That is another question. If the currency is to be inflated by printing and distributing money in any way, it should be the subject of a separate bill, considered by a committee, reported to the House, and considered on the floor in the ordinary way.

As has been pointed out by the gentleman from New York, there are a great number of different methods of procedure proposed in these two bills, and I feel, for the reasons I stated in the beginning of my remarks, to preserve the integrity and the continuity of the precedents upon questions of this sort, which I regard as of very grave importance to the House, the point of order is well taken, for the reason that the substitute, although seeking to effectuate a similar object, in principle, sets up an entirely different method of achieving that object.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma). The Chair is prepared to rule.

The bill under consideration provides for the sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia under a licensing system. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia by way of a substitute for the entire bill provides for the sale of alcoholic beverages under a system commonly known as the dispensary system. It is admitted that the provisions of the two measures are for the accomplishment of the same object; that is, the sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia. It will be apparent, however, to all Members that the methods used are widely different from each other. The Chair has before him a number of decisions holding that to a bill seeking to accomplish a purpose by one method—an amendment proposing to accomplish the same purpose by another method is not germane. The Chair will allude to the most recent of the decisions wherein this principle was enunciated. Mr. Speaker RAINEY, on April 13, 1933, had occasion to pass upon a question very similar to the one now presented to the Chair. Mr. Speaker RAINEY held that to a bill seeking to afford farm relief by a method of refinancing farm indebtedness through the issuance of bonds, an amendment proposing to effect such relief through the issuance of currency was not germane.

The Chair will not recite the numerous other instances wherein the same principle was enunciated. The Chair thinks that the decisions have been uniform with respect to this principle of the rule of germaneness, and the Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and on that motion I ask recognition.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 1, lines 1 and 2, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I regret very much that the Committee on the District of Columbia has seen fit to raise the point of order on the amendment which I have offered that would have given the House the opportunity to vote upon the alternative method of liquor control which I have offered, namely, the dispensary bill.

I have no quarrel with the decision of the Chair, which is eminently correct, if the point of germaneness was raised. However, if we cannot test the will of the House by that method, I propose to test it by this method: I have moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, the effect of which would be to kill this particular bill.

I would then ask the District Committee to consider the present dispensary bill, because by that method the membership of the House would have shown their preference for a dispensary bill; so my motion is to get the sentiment of the House, whether you want the bill reported by the District Committee or whether you want the dispensary bill.

I hope that those who, like me, believe that the best method is through a dispensary system will vote to strike out the enacting clause, and then they will have an opportunity to vote for the dispensary bill.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Has the gentleman in his bill provided for the proper labeling of liquor; for instance, whether it is a blend?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think so; but I am not concerned in the details of the bill. You may strengthen it in any way you please; I am simply interested in the principle of the dispensary system.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, for the same reasons that were advanced on the point of order the committee is opposed to the motion to strike out the enacting clause. The committee wants to see some consistency in the procedure of the House.

The gentleman from Virginia offered his bill before the committee. It was considered and voted down, and the present bill was reported on the floor of the House.

There is a proper procedure provided for the gentleman's bill, if he believes it is the right bill. We should consider this bill in the ordinary way and, if the bill is voted down, then the gentleman from Virginia can by petition get the Committee to report his bill. Orderly procedure requires that the Committee should vote down the motion to strike out the enacting clause. This bill is entitled to consideration by the House, to be read in the ordinary way, section by section, and the motion to strike out the enacting clause should be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the Committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Virginia) there were 62 ayes and 77 noes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SMITH of Virginia and Mrs. NORTON.

The Committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were 91 ayes and 118 noes.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. In the interpretation of this act, unless the context indicates a different meaning:

(a) The word "alcohol" means ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, from whatever source or by whatever processes produced.

(b) The word "spirits" means any beverage which contains alcohol obtained by distillation mixed with drinkable water and other substances in solution, including brandy, rum, whisky, and gin.

(c) The word "wine" means any alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar, including all artificial or imitation wines and also including fortified wines, such as port and sherry.

(d) The word "beer" means any fermented beverages of any name or description manufactured from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor.

(e) The words "alcoholic beverage" or "beverage" include the four varieties of liquor above defined (alcohol, spirits, wine, and beer) and every liquid or solid, patented or not, containing alcohol, spirits, wine, or beer and capable of being consumed by a human being. Any liquid or solid containing more than one of the four varieties above defined is considered as belonging to that variety which has the higher percentage of alcohol, according to the order in which they are above defined, except as provided in subsection (c) hereof. The provisions of this section and of this act shall not apply to any liquid or solid containing less than one half of 1 percent of alcohol by volume, nor shall anything contained in this act be construed as affecting the manufacture of apple cider or the sale thereof.

(f) The word "board" shall mean the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board created by this act.

(g) The word "club" means a corporation for the promotion of some common object (not including corporations organized for any commercial or business purpose, the object of which is money profit), owning, hiring, or leasing a building or space in a building of such extent and character as in the judgment of the board may be suitable and adequate for the reasonable and comfortable use and accommodations of its members and their guests, and including such space outside of the building and adjoining it as may be approved by the board, and provided with such suitable and adequate kitchen and dining-room space and equipment, implements, and facilities, and employing such a sufficient number of employees for cooking, preparing, and serving meals for its members and their guests, as shall satisfy the board that the sale of beverages intended is not more than an incident to and is not the prime source of revenue from such space; and the affairs and management of such corporation are conducted by a board of directors, executive committee, or similar body chosen by the members at least once each calendar year and no officer, agent, or employee of the club is paid directly or indirectly, or receives in the form of salary or other compensation, any profit from the disposition or sale of beverages to the club or to the members of the club or guests introduced by members beyond the amount of such salary as may be fixed and voted by the members, or by its directors or other governing body.

(h) The word "Commissioners" shall mean the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

(i) The word "District" shall mean the District of Columbia.

(j) The word "hotel" means a suitable building or other structure, approved by the board, including such suitable space outside of the building and adjoining it as may be approved by the board, kept, used, maintained, advertised, or held out to the public to be a place where meals are served and sleeping accommodations offered for pay to transient guests; in which 50 or more rooms are used for the sleeping accommodations of such transient guests, and having one or more dining rooms where meals are served to such transient guests, such sleeping accommodations and dining rooms being conducted in the same building or in connecting buildings, and such building or buildings, structure or structures being provided with such adequate kitchen and dining-room equipment and capacity and having employed therein such number and kinds of employees for preparing, cooking, and serving meals for its guests as shall satisfy the board that such dining room is intended for use primarily as a place for preparing, cooking, and serving meals and that the chief source of revenue to be derived from the operation of such dining room shall be from the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals and not from the sale of beverages. No such space shall be considered suitable if any business is conducted therein other than the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals, except such a business as is incidental to a bona fide dining room.

(k) The word "manufacture" shall include rectification.

(l) The word "meals" means the usual assortment of foods commonly ordered at various hours of the day and the serving of such food and victuals as sandwiches and salads shall not be regarded as a "meal."

(m) The word "person" includes an individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

(n) The word "restaurant" means a suitable space in a suitable building, approved by the board, including such suitable space outside of the building and adjoining it as may be approved by the board, kept, used, maintained, advertised, or held out to the public to be a place where meals are served, such space being provided with such adequate kitchen and dining-room equipment and capacity, and having employed therein such number and kinds of employees for preparing, cooking, and serving meals for its guests as shall satisfy the board that such space is intended for use primarily as a place for preparing, cooking, and serving meals, and that the chief source of revenue to be derived from the operation of such place shall be from the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals and not from the sale of beverages. No such space shall be considered suitable if any business is conducted therein other than the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals, except such a business as is incidental to a bona fide restaurant.

(o) The word "sell" or "sale" shall include offering for sale, keeping for sale, trafficking in, bartering, delivering for value, exchanging for goods, or in any way other than purely gratuitously, and every delivery of any alcoholic beverage made otherwise than by purely gratuitous title shall constitute a sale.

(p) The word "table" shall not include a counter, bar, or similar contrivance.

(q) The word "tavern" means a suitable space in a suitable building approved by the board, including such suitable space outside of the building and adjoining it, as may be approved by the board, kept, used, maintained, advertised, or held out to the public to be a place where sandwiches or light lunches are prepared and served for consumption on the premises in such quantities as to satisfy the board that the sale of beer intended is no more than an incident to and is not the prime source of revenue of such "tavern."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "sherry", insert "light wines shall mean wines containing 14 percent or less of alcohol by volume, other than champagne or any wine artificially carbonated."

The committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURNHAM: Page 2, line 22, after the word "means", strike out the remainder of the paragraph to and including the word "sherry" on page 3, line 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "wine, as defined in title XXVI, sections 441 and 444, of the Code of the Laws of the United States of America as now in force or hereafter amended, and champagne and sparkling wines and artificially carbonated wines means all the foregoing as defined by regulations of the Treasury Department as now or hereafter in effect."

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, this simple amendment is for the purpose of clarifying the clause subsection (c). It conforms to the statutes of the United States and also the code prepared and adopted by the N.R.A., the code of fair competition. It simply clarifies. I do not think it requires any further argument on my part.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The Commissioners are hereby authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as they may deem necessary to carry out the purposes thereof and to control and regulate the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale, offer for sale, solicitation of orders for sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia for the protection of the public health, comfort, safety, and morals.

The Commissioners shall have specific authority to make rules and regulations for the issuance, transfer, and revocation of licenses; to facilitate and insure the collection of taxes; to govern the operation of the business of licensees, with full power and authority to prescribe the terms and conditions under which alcoholic beverages may be sold by each class of licensees; to forbid the issuance of licensees for manufacture, sale, or storage of alcoholic beverages in such localities in, and such sections and portions of, the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest; to limit the number of licenses of each class to be issued in the District of Columbia and to limit the number of licenses of each class in any locality in, or sections or portions of, the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest; to forbid the issuance of licenses for businesses conducted on such premises as they, in the public interest, may deem inappropriate; to forbid the issuance of any class or classes of licenses for businesses conducted near or around schools, colleges, universities, churches, or public institutions, to prescribe the hours during which beverages may be sold and to forbid the sale on Sundays or any holiday or holidays. The powers and authorities expressly enumerated are to be construed as in addition to, and not by way of limitation of, the general powers herein granted. Different regulations may be prescribed for the different classes of licenses, for the different classes of beverages, and for different localities in or sections or portions of the District of Columbia.

Any regulations promulgated hereunder shall become effective 5 days after being published in any daily newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia. Such regulations may be altered or amended from time to time as the Commissioners may deem desirable. The Commissioners shall also have authority in any time of public emergency, without previous notice or advertisement, to prohibit the sale of any or all beverages during the period of such emergency.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 11, line 3, after the word "interest", strike out "to limit the number of licenses of each class to be issued in the District of Columbia and to limit the number of licenses of each class in any locality in or sections or portions of the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest.

Page 11, line 11, after the word "businesses", insert "established subsequent to April 5, 1933."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey please explain what is sought to be achieved by this language?

Mrs. NORTON. It was intended to safeguard those who had already spent a considerable amount of money in fitting up establishments prior to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

With the further committee amendment: Page 11, line 15, after the word "Sundays", strike out "or any holiday or holidays."

The committee amendments were severally considered and severally agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) No provision of this act shall by reason only that such product contains any alcoholic beverage, prevent—

(1) The manufacture or sale of any perfume, lotion, tincture, varnish, dressing, fluid extract or essence, or vinegar; or

(2) The manufacture or sale of any officinal, medicinal, or pharmaceutical preparation, or of any patented or prepared medicine intended solely for medicinal purposes, provided that such product does not contain alcohol in any greater quantity than the amount required as a solvent or preservative, or provided that it be so compounded as to render it unsuitable for use as a beverage.

(b) If the board shall find, after notice to the manufacturer of, or person acquiring for resale, any of the products enumerated above, and after opportunity to be heard, that any of said products are being used as an alcoholic beverage, the board may notify such manufacturer or person to that effect, and from and after the date of the service of such last-mentioned notice this act shall apply to such product; and such manufacturer or person shall commit an offense under this act if he sells such product after the service of such notice without a license issued under this act so to do. This paragraph shall not apply to a preparation prepared by a pharmacist on prescription of a physician and in accordance with its tenor, or which is prepared by a physician for the use only of a patient actually under his care.

(c) The notice provided for in this section shall be served upon the manufacturer or person acquiring such product for resale, personally, if he can be found within the District of Columbia, and if he cannot be so found it shall be sufficient service of said notice to deliver the same to some person of proper age upon the premises of the manufacturer or person acquiring such product for resale.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. NORTON: Page 12, strike out all of section 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 8. No provision of this act shall apply to alcohol intended for use in the manufacture and sale of any of the following when they are unfit for intoxicating beverage purposes, namely:

"(a) Denatured alcohol produced and used pursuant to acts of Congress and regulations promulgated thereunder.

"(b) Patent, proprietary, medicinal, pharmaceutical, antiseptic, and toilet preparations.

"(c) Flavoring extracts, sirups, and food products.

"(d) Scientific, chemical, mechanical, and industrial products.

"Any person who shall knowingly sell any of the products enumerated in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), or (d) for intoxicating beverage purposes, or who shall sell any of the same under circumstances from which he might reasonably deduce the intention of the purchaser to use them for such purposes, shall be subject to the penalties provided for in section 33 of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. (a) No individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall, within the District of Columbia, manufacture for sale, keep for sale, or sell any alcoholic beverage without having first obtained a license under this act for such manufacture or sale, except as provided in sections 31 and 32 hereof.

(b) No individual shall, within the District of Columbia, offer for sale or solicit any order for the sale of, within the District of Columbia, any alcoholic beverage unless:

(1) Such individual has first obtained a license of the character described in section 11, subsection (k); and

(2) The vendor is the holder of a license issued under this act authorizing such sale.

Nothing in this subsection shall apply to any offer for sale or solicitation made upon the premises designated in the license of the vendor.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 14, line 3, after the article "a", strike out the word "license" and insert "manufacture's license, class A or class B, or a wholesaler's license, class A or class B."

Page 14, after line 8, insert:

"No individual shall within the District of Columbia offer any beverage for sale to, or solicit orders for the sale of any beverage from, any person not a licensee under this act, irrespective of whether such sale is to be made in or without the District of Columbia."

The committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. Licenses issued under authority of this act shall be of 11 kinds:

(a) Manufacturer's license, class A: To operate a rectifying plant, a distillery, or a winery. Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to operate a rectifying plant for the manufacture of the products of rectification by purifying or combining spirits, wine, or beer; a distillery for the manufacture of alcohol or spirits by distillation or redistillation; or a winery for the manufacture of wine; at the place therein described, but such license shall not authorize more than one of said activities, namely, that of a rectifying plant, a distillery, or a winery, and a separate license shall be required for each such plant. Such a license shall also authorize the sale from the licensed place of the products manufactured under such license by the licensee to another license holder for resale or to a dealer outside of the District of Columbia for resale. It shall not authorize the sale of beverages to any other person except as may be provided by regulations promulgated by the Commissioners under this act. The annual fee for such license for a rectifying plant shall be $2,000; for a distillery shall be $2,000; and for a winery shall be $500: Provided, however, That if a manufacturer shall operate a distillery only for the manufacture of alcohol and more than 50 percent of such alcohol is sold for nonbeverage purposes, the annual fee shall be $1,000. If said manufacturer holding a license issued at the rate last mentioned shall sell during any license period 50 percent or more of said alcohol for beverage purposes, he shall pay to the collector of taxes the difference between the license fee paid and the license fee for a distiller of spirits.

(b) Manufacturer's license, class B: To operate brewery. Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to operate a brewery for the manufacture of beer at the place therein described. It shall also authorize the sale from the licensed place of the beer manufactured under such license to another license holder for resale or to a dealer outside of the District of Columbia for resale, or to a consumer. Said manufacturer may sell beer to the consumer only in barrels, kegs, and sealed bottles and said barrels, kegs, and bottles shall not be opened after sale nor the contents consumed on the premises where sold. The annual fee for such license shall be $2,500.

(c) Wholesaler's license, class A: Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beverages from the place therein described to another license holder for resale or to a dealer outside of the District of Columbia for resale and, in addition, in the case of beer, to a consumer, said beverages to be sold only in barrels, kegs, sealed bottles, and other closed containers, which said barrels, kegs, sealed bottles, and other closed containers shall not be opened after sale nor the contents consumed on the premises where sold.

No holder of such a license shall be engaged in any business on the premises for which the license is issued other than the sale of alcoholic and nonalcoholic beverages.

The annual fee for such license shall be $1,500.

(d) Wholesaler's license, class B: Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beer from the place therein described to another license holder for resale or to a dealer outside of the District of Columbia for resale or to a consumer in barrels, kegs, sealed bottles, and other closed containers, which said barrels, kegs, sealed bottles, and other closed containers shall not be opened after sale nor the contents consumed on the premises where sold.

The annual fee for such license shall be $750.

(e) Retailer's license, class A: Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beverages from the place therein described and to deliver the same in the barrel, keg, sealed bottle, or other closed container in which the same was received by the licensee, which said barrel, keg, sealed bottle, or other closed container shall not be opened nor the contents consumed on the premises where sold. Such license shall not authorize the licensee to sell to other licensees for resale.

The annual fee for such license shall be $750.

(f) Retailer's license, class B: Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beer from the place therein described and to deliver the same in the barrel, keg, sealed bottle, or other closed container in which the same was received by the licensee, which said barrel, keg, sealed bottle, or other closed container shall not be opened nor the contents consumed on the premises where sold. Such license shall not authorize the licensee to sell to other licensees for resale.

The annual fee for such license shall be $75.

(g) Retailer's license, class C: Such a license shall be issued only for a bona fide restaurant, hotel, or club, or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals, or a club car or a dining car on a railroad. It shall authorize the holder thereof to keep for sale and to sell spirits, wine, and beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place. Except in the case of clubs and hotels no beverage shall be sold or served to a customer in any closed container. In the case of restaurants, passenger-carrying marine vessels, and club cars or dining cars on a railroad, said spirits and wine shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables and beer shall be sold and served only to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters, except that spirits, wine, and beer may be sold or served to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the board. In the case of hotels, said beverages may be sold and served only in the private room of a registered guest or to persons seated at public tables or to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room, when such room has been previously approved by the board. Beer may also be sold and served to persons seated at bona fide lunch counters. And in the case of clubs, said beverages may be sold and served in the private room of a member or guest of a member, or to persons seated at tables. No license shall be issued to a club which has not been established for at least 3 months immediately prior to the making of the application for such license. No spirits shall be displayed by any licensee licensed under this paragraph, or his agents or employees, in the space in which said beverages are sold or served, except such spirits as may be expressly ordered by a customer.

The fee for such a license shall be for a restaurant, $500 per annum; for a hotel, $1,000 per annum; for a club, $250 per annum; for a marine vessel serving meals, $50 per month or $500 per annum; and for each railroad dining car or club car, $5 per month or $50 per annum.

(h) Retailer's license, class D: Such a license shall be issued only for a bona fide restaurant, tavern, hotel, or club, or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals, light lunches, or sandwiches, or a club car or a dining car on a railroad. Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place. Except in the case of clubs and hotels, no beer shall be sold or served to a customer in any closed container. In the case of restaurants, taverns, passenger-carrying marine vessels, and club cars or dining cars on a railroad, said beer shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters, except that beer may be sold or served to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the board. In the case of hotels, beer may be sold and served only in the private room of a registered guest or to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters or to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the Board. And in the case of clubs, beer may be sold and served in the private room of a member or guest of a member, or to persons seated at tables. No license shall be issued to a club which has not been established for at least 3 months immediately prior to the making of the application for such license.

The annual fee for such a license shall be $150.

(i) Retailer's license, class E: Such a license shall authorize a person entitled to retail, compound, and dispense medicines and poisons to sell from the place therein described beverages in sealed packages, not to exceed 1 quart each, for medicinal purposes, and only upon prescription of a duly licensed practicing physician. Such package shall not be opened after sale nor its contents consumed on the premises where sold. Such prescription, when filled, shall be canceled by writing across its face the word "Canceled" together with the date on which it is presented and filled, and such prescriptions shall be numbered consecutively as filled and kept on file in consecutive order. No such prescription shall be refilled. The annual fee for such license shall be $25.

(j) Retailer's license, class F: Such license shall authorize the holder thereof temporarily to sell beer on the premises therein described for consumption on the premises where sold. Such permits may be issued for a banquet, picnic, bazar, fair, or similar public or private gathering where food is served for consumption on the premises. No beer shall be sold or served to a customer in any unopened container. The issuance of such a permit shall be solely in the discretion of the board. The fee for each such license shall be $5 per day.

(k) Solicitor's licenses: Such a license shall authorize the licensee to offer for sale or solicit orders for the sale of any beverage, if the vendor of such beverage is the holder of a license issued under this act authorizing such sale.

A solicitor's license shall set forth the name of the vendor whom the solicitor represents, and such solicitor shall not represent any vendor whose name does not appear upon such license.

The annual fee for such license shall be $2.

Nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing any portion of section 7 of the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved July 1, 1902, as amended.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 15, line 5, after the word "combining", insert the word "alcohol."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following further committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following further committee amendment:

Page 18, line 5, after the word "beer", insert the words "and light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following further committee amendment:

Page 18, line 13, strike out "$75" and insert "$100."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following further committee amendment:

Page 18, beginning in line 16, after the word "meals", strike out the comma and the words "or a club car or a dining car on a railroad."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the reason why the committee may have adopted this amendment. In all the license bills throughout the States they have licensed railroad cars and club cars on the railroads. The idea seems to be that a railroad car—a dining car or club car—spends so little time either in the station in Washington or in passing through the District that it is not worth while to license it. Of course, it is up to the railroads whether they desire to pay the fee for the license for a railroad car; but if a railroad car has a license all the way from Buffalo down to Washington and is going south to Florida it seems to me rather peculiar that it may not get a license while in the District of Columbia.

If the railroads do not want to pay for the license, that is another matter; but if they wish to procure a license, I think they should be entitled to that license, because sometimes the cars do stay in the station for an hour or two waiting to take on passengers who are going to Florida. If they must close their doors, if they must refuse to serve liquor, if they must determine just the exact moment when they reach the line of the District of Columbia and when they leave it at the other end going south, that in itself will make confusion, and it will make for violations of the law. I think the committee might well let these railroad cars which come into the District have the same privileges which they have in other States, and if they desire to pay this license fee, which, I understand, was in the original bill $50 per car per year, let them do it, and let them sell liquor while they are in the District. I cannot see anything to be gained by prohibiting the sale of liquor as soon as they pass the District line, wherever it is, and allow them to open when they get into Virginia. I think it is a minor thing that should not be put in the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say, in answer to the gentleman from New York, that the committee did not feel justified in asking the railroad companies to pay a license fee for the very short time the cars are within the District of Columbia. It was estimated in the committee that there were very few trains which remained in the District more than a few moments, and the committee did not feel justified in asking them to pay a license fee for that short time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But what I am getting at is this: Of course, they cannot sell liquor while in the District of Columbia unless they pay the license fee?

Mrs. NORTON. Exactly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If they are willing to pay the license fee, why do you not let them do it?

Mrs. NORTON. I understood they preferred not to pay.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If they do not pay the license fee, they just cannot sell it, but what I would like to see provided for is that if they are willing to pay the license fee, they shall have the same privilege in the District of Columbia as they have in any other State. It is up to them whether they will go to that expense or not.

Mrs. NORTON. That is true, but my understanding is that they preferred not to pay the license fee because of the very short time they were in the District.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Their preference does not enter into the question of what kind of liquor control law we should pass.

Mrs. NORTON. But it does enter into whether or not the Committee considers it fair or just.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is imaginable that nobody might feel like paying the tax you have placed on a distillery here, but at the same time we are providing for that tax. That is entirely up to the distillers. I think we should give the railroads the right to sell liquor in the District if they will pay the fee, and if they do not pay the fee they just cannot sell it.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the committee considered not giving the railroads a license. There is no objection to giving them a license. As the lady from New Jersey stated, I think the question was that they did not prefer it. Of course, I can readily understand the position of the gentleman from New York. As far as the committee was concerned, we had no objection to permitting a $5 license fee, but we understood they did not want it, and for that reason we eliminated it.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Even if that language did remain in the measure, there is nothing compulsory upon the railroads to avail themselves of it.

Mr. PALMISANO. As a member of the committee, I do not think the committee as a whole cares whether it is eliminated or not. We simply went along with the request made. We had no objection. If you want to permit it, let it stay.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 18, line 22, strike out the word "restaurants" and insert the words "restaurants and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 18, line 23, after the word "vessels", strike out the words "and club cars or dining cars on a railroad."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

In view of the fact the committee amendment just above relating to lines 16 and 17 was not agreed to, this committee, in order to be consistent, should strike out all reference to the same subject.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say that the committee will withdraw this amendment. It really makes very little difference whether or not it remains.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 18, line 24, after the word "wine", insert the words "except light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 19, line 1, after the word "beer", insert the words "and light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 10, after the word "beer", add the words "and light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 17, after the word "spirits", insert the words "nor wines, except light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 21, after the word "spirits", insert the words "and wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 24, after the word "hotel", insert "under 100 rooms, $500 per annum; for a hotel of 100 or more rooms, $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 2, after the word "annum", strike out the words "and for each railroad dining car or club car, $5 per month or $50 per annum."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will withdraw this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 20, line 8, after the word "sandwiches", strike out "or a club car or a dining car on a railroad."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will withdraw this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the committee amendment which was agreed to, on page 18, line 22.

It was an amendment merely clarifying and correcting the language. It is unnecessary, in view of the later amendment. In view of this, perhaps the action of the committee should be reconsidered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 20, line 13, after the word "taverns", insert the word "and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 20, line 14, after the word "vessels", strike out "and club cars or dining cars on a railroad."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentlewoman from New Jersey desire to withdraw this particular amendment?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall withdraw all amendments pertaining to this particular clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 21, line 5, strike out the figures "$150" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$200."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 21, line 21, after the word "beer", insert the words "and light wines."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 22, line 5, strike out all of subsection "K" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"K. Solicitor's licenses: Such a license shall authorize the licensee to offer for sale to or solicit orders from licensees for the sale of any beverage if the vendor of such beverage is the holder of a manufacturer's license class A or class B, or a wholesaler's license class A or class B, issued under this act, authorizing such sale."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEIDEMAN: Page 18, commencing with the word "and", in line 18, strike out through the word "place", in line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "at the place described therein and to sell spirits, wines, and beer on the ground floor only of said place for consumption on such ground floor only which said place of sale shall be exposed to public view."

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw the attention of the Members on this side of the House to the provisions of the Democratic platform, particularly the portion reading as follows:

We advocate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. To effect such repeal we demand that the Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment, to truly representative conventions in the States called to act solely on that proposal; we urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States.

WE MUST KEEP FAITH WITH THE COUNTRY

Under the bill as at present drawn there is nothing to bring liquor in the open in a so-called "night club", which is an invention of the prohibition era. Such a club on the second floor is entirely concealed from public view, and they will sell liquor in little 2-by-4 cubbyholes, as they do at present in our speak-easies. Girls of the tenderest age are admitted to such places. They place no limitation on the age of those who may enter; so if friends of temperance really want to do something to help us keep the liberty we have gained after such a long fight and really make control effective, we should bring this thing out into the open. Otherwise we will have the bootlegger as we did in the days of prohibition. They will be selling their wares in the basements and on the second floors, behind closed doors and in back of partitions and curtains, where the youth of the land will be sold liquor as at present.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to do my drinking in the open. If you really want temperance, open these places to public view where people can see what is going on. In the State of Michigan they legalized beer gardens, but in the front windows of all these beer gardens are signs and draperies, and the result is one cannot see what is going on inside, resulting in indiscretions which would not happen if these places were open to public view.

As a result, 75 percent of the people in those beer gardens are young people. We have a "sitting down" clause there, too, and they sit until they are intoxicated on the stuff they are selling now. This does not promote the cause of temperance. If we are really sincere in this, we ought to effect the open sale of liquor. The bill here is just about as close to a saloon as we can get. We do not call it that in the bill, but a name does not mean anything. I think the sooner you bring it out in the open the less intemperance you will have.

WE DEMAND THAT SPEAK-EASIES BE ABOLISHED

I am sure that the millions of decent, law-abiding citizens of this country who voted to repeal the eighteenth amendment did so with the belief that our new order of things would protect the youth of the country, that the new order would not countenance speak-easies or bootleg parlors; that the repeal would promote obedience to law, and would abolish the racketeer and the bootlegger, and would stop the indiscriminate selling of liquor to the youth of the country. We should put these principles into effect.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I sympathize with what the gentleman says, because I believe America has never known how to handle the liquor traffic. I have always advocated it being in the open, but you have to be practical about it. Does the gentleman mean by that amendment that even a hotel or club could not sell it on the second floor? Is that the purpose?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. This would apply to every holder of a retail-license class.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is, clubs and hotels?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. It includes all of them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Be practical about it. Some hotels have nothing on the first floor. The Press Club here in Washington is on the thirteenth floor. You would bar the Press Club. Some of the country clubs have nothing but lockers on the first floor. You would bar them. I would go along with the gentleman to the extent of having no blinds on the windows, but I do not agree with the gentleman as far as hotels are concerned.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman. I will accept an amendment to except clubs.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the city of Washington some of the best managed restaurants are on the second floor. I cannot see that there is any justification in exempting hotels and clubs. I do not care to mention the particular restaurants I have in mind, but I am sure you have been to some of the places I refer to. These restaurants have two floors.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I know the place the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think it would be wrong to exclude them from the privilege of selling liquor.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I would like to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin. It is unfortunate that in any restriction someone has to suffer, but inasmuch as we are trying to bring liquor out into the open it is too bad if the restaurant is on the second floor. They will have to move downstairs where it will be out in the open. The people were not so much interested in preventing the return of the saloon as they were in suppressing drinking behind curtains and closed doors and in speak-easies. That is what the people wanted particularly to suppress.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does not the gentleman believe that there is some way to reach that problem without making an arbitrary rule along this line against well-managed restaurants?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Nevertheless, we must be firm in our demand to live up to our platform, and protect those people who need protection. The so-called "wets" brought about prohibition before. Let us protect ourselves against the selfish interests of today. The friends of liberalism must protect this new liberty which we have acquired. The cause of liberalism must not be allowed to be "sold short" by the predatory interests—more interested in capitalizing on repeal for their personal gain than in keeping the rights newly acquired.

Mrs. NORTON. I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think the gentleman's amendment is not practical. It would be utterly impossible to enforce such a regulation, just as impossible as it was to enforce the eighteenth amendment. We know perfectly well that such a provision would be violated; and, as has been so well stated, there are a great many restaurants, and there are a great many hotels, that would certainly suffer as a result of this amendment. I do not think it would bring about any greater degree of temperance. In fact it would probably cause the same disrespect for the law we have experienced during the past 14 years, and which we hoped we were through with when the eighteenth amendment was repealed. So, Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WEIDEMAN: Page 18, commencing with the word "and" in line 18, strike out through the word "place" in line 20. Insert in lieu thereof "at the place described therein, and to sell spirits, wine, and beer on the ground floor only in said place for consumption on such ground floor only, which said place of sale shall be exposed to public view, except this provision shall not apply to incorporated clubs or hotels."

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I rise in opposition to the modified amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. I am in favor of the amendment as originally offered.

Referring back to our Democratic platform, the threefold provision that we have heard so many times this afternoon is: First, to promote temperance; second, to effectively prevent the return of the saloon; and third, to bring the liquor traffic into the open under camplete supervision and control by the States. This amendment is directed to the third feature of this regulatory provision on liquor of the Democratic national platform. In the Republican platform the provision is more stringent than ours.

LET US KEEP FAITH WITH OUR PLATFORM

There is no use kidding ourselves. As has been said repeatedly on the floor this afternoon, the saloon is coming back. In fact, it is already here. The question is, Are we going to keep faith with our own platform and have the Members on this side of the aisle drive the liquor traffic into the open, effectively regulate it, and promote temperance in every way?

THE DISPENSARY SYSTEM

The majority of this House voted against the dispensary system. That system would, I believe, very largely have taken the profit out of the liquor business and would have kept the distillers and the brewers of this country from controlling the politics of the Nation. We have not promoted temperance in the bill before us, because it is admitted that the saloon is back and will be operated in a wide-open fashion as of old. It is true the bill does not define the word "saloon", but Webster's Dictionary and Bouvier's Dictionary and others define it as "anywhere intoxicating liquor is sold."

Are we this afternoon going to wink at every provision of our platform and say by our vote that we are unwilling to bring the liquor traffic into the open, so that all who see may know who is drinking, and so that we may protect, in a measure, the oncoming generation from inhabiting the saloons which this bill is now establishing?

LET US SUPERVISE AND CONTROL, NOT TURN THEM LOOSE

I was amused at my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and his suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN] that we ought to bar from the provisions of the amendment the hotels and the clubs from those who are not to sell liquor above the first floor.

If you do this, you kill the effect of the amendment entirely. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] comes along and says that we have many restaurants above the first floor and they ought to be exempted also.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to keep this saloon business down on the ground floor and keep the blinds back, as we did by regulations before prohibition, so we can run them out in the open in the best way we can and keep reasonable order, or as reasonable as we were ever able to keep.

You know what brought on prohibition. It was largely because of lack of regulation and lack of respect for law and the side-door entrances that brought in the women and children and brought about many other abuses with which we are all familiar.

Are you going to sit by blindly and allow the same abuses to be permitted? This is what you are going to do if you continue to vote down these proposed amendments.

I hope you will at least adopt a great many of the amendments now pending and also vote for the amendment now before us.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. BOLAND. With respect to the gentleman's statement about what brought on prohibition, I believe that the thing that principally brought on prohibition was the United Brewers' Association of America.

Mr. McFARLANE. In answer to the gentleman, I may say that we had the brewers' association in my own State to corrupt the politics of Texas. They gave to the then Governor of our State $156,000, which caused his impeachment. The politics of our State was rotten to the core, and I am sure the gentleman is familiar with similar situations of corruption in other States. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] is a little wrong about his interpretation of the platform about bringing the liquor business into the open.

This has nothing to do with giving the public the right to look into your window when you are sitting at your dinner to find out what you have on the table.

We intended to bring it into the open so that you could send a brewer's truck through the city streets where everybody could see it. We intended to bring it into the open so that the man selling liquor would have a legal business which he would openly conduct and the entire public would know that he was conducting this business. But we never intended to go back to that old, dreadful censorship where everybody could spy on everybody else at any time anyone was taking a glass of beer or a glass of wine. Sometime someone might be giving a nice party in a hotel and would be buying liquor and having a dance. There would be fine people there, including his oldtime comrades and pals. Does the gentleman from Texas think it was intended by the Democratic platform that the whole world had a right to stand at the window and look on and say, "Oh, there is Jimmie Jones, he is taking a Scotch highball. There is Johnny Smith, he is taking a rye highball—isn't that terrible?"

This is just the thing we wanted to get away from. Privacy in drinking is one of the things we have fought for and won in the last campaign, and if the gentleman from Texas wants to know how the country stands, let him ask the people of Texas whom he represents, and they will tell him that they want none of this oldtime censorship or espionage which disgraced American public life.

I believe we ought to have the right to drink liquor practically any place we want to drink it. Temperance will come from the self-control of the individual and you cannot get it from the control of the police over the individual. This has been tested out on a country-wide basis and has been found to be a false doctrine, and America will not return to it. So far as we are concerned we do not intend to let the National Capital be the place where we will try out another spy system, another censorship system, another system where the citizen is not trusted except with a policeman at his elbow.

You may talk about corruption in political life, due to liquor, but did we not have enough of it under the dry cause? Did we not see all political conventions controlled by a pack of fanatics? Did we not see the type and kind of men who came to govern the Nation become mere blackmailers and extortioners?

They speak of corrupt control of liquor. We do not ask that there be any stopping of censorship of corruption. We want the whole power of government to destroy corruption, but you get more corruption by narrow censorship than you will get by liberal administrative action. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. O'CONNOR: On page 15, line 19, strike out "2,000" in each instance and insert "3,500."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to fix the license fee of a rectifying plant or a distillery at $3,500. I do that because the bill, on page 16, fixes the license fee of a brewery at $2,500. I believe the license fee of a distillery or rectifying plant should be more than the license fee of a brewery in proportion.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 19, line 17, after the period following the word "license", strike out all of the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, as I read this provision on page 19, beginning in line 17, it provides that none of these spirits or wines or beers in any of these places can be exposed to the public view. In other words, the bartender has to reach under the counter for the bottle. If it is permissible to sell the stuff, it ought to be seen by the public before the public buys it. A man ought to be able to look at the bottle and the label and see what he is getting.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 21, line 11, after the word "physician", insert "for liquors as defined by the United States Pharmacopœia."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to prescribe that a drug store, which under this bill is entitled only to furnish liquor on physician's prescriptions, must furnish what is well known to physicians or pharmacists as "liquor." The United States Pharmacopœia describes whisky or spiritus frumenti as liquor aged in wood 4 years, and if a physician gives a prescription for spiritus frumenti the druggist should not be able to fill it with a blended or rectified or a "cut" whisky, which is not whisky aged 4 years, and which is injurious to some people, either infants or old people.

The druggist should be restricted to what is well known as "spiritus frumenti", as defined by the United States Pharmacopœia. No one can complain about that. The druggists can only sell liquor on prescriptions now. Here is what will happen if this amendment is not agreed to. The decent physician will prescribe "spiritus frumenti", but some druggists will have on hand their pet paid physicians—and some have them permanently on the job—who will prescribe "blended" or "compounded" whisky, which is not proper prescription whisky at all. If you provide that every prescription shall be under the well-known definition of "spiritus frumenti" of the United States Pharmacopœia, you will meet and destroy that fraud on the public. The respectable physicians and the District of Columbia Pharmaceutical Association endorse the idea, as do also the honest druggists in the District.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I see the sense of that and the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. The holder of a manufacturer's or wholesaler's license issued hereunder shall not be entitled to hold any other class of license. No retailer's license class A or class B shall be issued or remain in force in respect of any premises for which a retailer's license class C or class D has been issued. A person, not licensed hereunder, owning an establishment for the manufacture of beverages may hold one wholesale license, and shall not be entitled to hold any other license.

With the following committee amendments:

"(b) No licensee holding a retailer's license, except a retailer's license class E, by direct ownership, stock ownership, or interlocking directors shall hold directly or indirectly any other retailer's license. When used in this subsection the word 'license' shall include any stockholder holding directly or indirectly 25 percent or more of the common stock or any officer of such licensee if such licensee is a corporation."

The committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. (a) Any individual, partnership, or corporation desiring a license under this act shall file with the board an application in such form as the Commissioners may prescribe, and such application shall contain such additional information as the board may require, and (except in the case of an application for a manufacturer's, retailer's license class E, or solicitor's license) shall contain a statement setting forth the name and address of the true and actual owner of the premises upon which the business to be licensed is to be conducted. Before a license is issued the board shall satisfy itself:

1. That the applicant, if an individual, or, if a partnership, each of the members of the partnership, or if a corporation, each of its principal officers and directors, is of good moral character and generally fit for the trust to be in him reposed.

2. That the applicant, if an individual, or, if a partnership, each of the members of the partnership, or, if a corporation, each of its principal officers, is a citizen of the United States, not less than 21 years of age, and has never been convicted of a felony.

3. Except in the case of an application for a solicitor's license, that the applicant is the true and actual owner of the business for which the license is desired, and that he intends to carry on the business authorized by the license for himself and not as the agent of any individual, partnership, association, or corporation, and that he intends to superintend in person the management of the business licensed, or intends to have some other person, to be approved by the board, manage the business for him, which said manager must possess all of the qualifications required of a licensee hereunder.

4. That in the case of an applicant for a wholesaler's license or a retailer's license (except a retailer's license class E), no manufacturer or wholesaler of beverages other than the applicant (including a stockholder holding 25 percent or more of the common stock, or an officer of any manufacturer or wholesaler of beverages, if such manufacturer or wholesaler is a corporation), has such a substantial interest, direct or indirect, in the business for which the license is requested, or in the premises in respect of which such license is to be issued, as in the judgment of the board may tend to influence such licensee to purchase beverages from such manufacturer or wholesaler, and that such business will not be conducted with any money, equipment, furniture, fixtures, or property rented from or loaned or given by any such manufacturer or wholesaler (including such stockholder or officer) or sold by such manufacturer or wholesaler (including such stockholder or officer) to any such licensee for less than the fair market value or upon a conditional sale agreement or chattel trust.

5. That the place for which the license is to be issued is an appropriate one considering the character of the premises, its surroundings, and the wishes of the persons residing or owning property in the neighborhood of the premises for which the license is desired.

(b) Before granting a retailer's license, except a retailer's license class E or class F, the board shall give notice by advertisement published once a week and for at least 2 weeks in some newspaper of general circulation published in the District of Columbia. The advertisement so published shall contain the name of the applicant and a description by street and number, or other plain designation, of the particular location for which the license is requested and the class of license desired. Such notice shall state that remonstrants are entitled to be heard before the granting of such licenses and shall name the time and place of such hearing. There shall also be posted by the board a notice, in a conspicuous place, on the outside of the premises. This notice shall state that remonstrants are entitled to be heard before the granting of such license and shall name the same time and place for such hearing as set out in the public advertisement; and if remonstrance against the granting of such license is filed, no final action shall be taken by the board until the remonstrant shall have had an opportunity to be heard, under rules and regulations prescribed by said board. Any person willfully removing, obilterating, marring, or defacing said notice shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this act.

(c) Except in the case of a retailer's license class C, to be issued for a hotel or club, or a retailer's license class B or class E, no place shall be deemed appropriate if the owners of a majority of the real property within a radius of 600 feet of the boundary lines of the lot or parcel of ground upon which is situated the place for which the license is desired, shall, on a form to be prescribed by the Commissioners and filed with the board, object to the granting of such license. In determining the sufficiency of such objections the owners of all such property not lying within a residential-use district as defined in the zoning regulations and shown in the official atlases of the Zoning Commission shall be taken as consenting to the granting of such license, except that the Commissioners shall have power to file objections on behalf of any property lying within such radius owned by the United States or the District of Columbia. This subsection shall be construed as a limitation upon the discretion of the board in granting a license and not as a limitation upon the discretion of the board in refusing a license.

(d) A separate application shall be filed with respect to each place of business. The required license fee shall be paid to the collector of taxes and his duplicate receipt shall accompany the application for license. In the event the license is denied, the fee shall be returned. Each application (except an application for a retailer's license class F or a solicitor's license) shall be accompanied by a bond on a form to be prescribed by the Commissioners, executed by the applicant with corporate surety approved by the board, in the penal sum of $1,000, said bond to run to the District of Columbia and be conditioned upon the payment by the applicant of any and all taxes due the District of Columbia under this act and any and all fines that may be imposed upon the applicant under this act. Said bond shall not become operative unless and until the license applied for is issued, and in the event said application is denied said bond shall be returned. Every such application shall be verified by the affidavit of the applicant, if an individual, or by all of the members of a partnership, or by the president or vice president of a corporation. If any false statement is knowingly made in such application, or in any accompanying statement under oath which may be required by the Commissioners or the board, the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of perjury. The making of a false statement in any such application or in any such accompanying statement, whether made with or without the knowledge or consent of the applicant, shall, in the discretion of the board, constitute sufficient cause for the revocation of the license.

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK: Page 28, after the word "license", in line 15, insert the following:

"Provided, however, That none of the provisions of this act shall prevent the board from promulgating regulations to permit the lawful, bona fide owners of warehouse receipts for bonded liquors stored in Government warehouses, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, from withdrawing such bonded liquors for personal use on payment to the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia of taxes at such rates as provided in this section: Provided, That such bona fide holders of such warehouse receipts held legal title to such warehouse receipts prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the interest of various people who now hold warehouse receipts for liquor. It is the same situation as was met in the several States, but not met with so well. For instance, in Maryland the holder of a bona fide warehouse certificate for liquor could not get his liquor directly himself, but must go to a wholesaler who had a license, and the practice has grown up of the wholesaler charging the holder of a warehouse certificate various amounts of money for the service given. By this amendment the holder of the warehouse certificate having liquor now in a warehouse and there before the act, can, by paying the proper tax, submit the certificate and get his liquor.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Has this amendment been taken up with either of the District Commissioners?

Mr. BLACK. No; it has not.

Mr. BRITTEN. The amendment sounds very good to me.

Mr. BLACK. I think it was overlooked. That is all.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like to ask what change that makes in the existing law in regard to the withdrawal of liquor?

Mr. BLACK. Nothing, except that everything is changed by the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. By the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and by this act the whole system is changed.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is there anything in this bill in regard to the withdrawal from warehouses?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think so; no.

Mr. McFARLANE. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma). The Chair overrules the point of order. The point of order comes too late.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 28, line 24, after the word "with", strike out the word "corporate."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, one can imagine the number of applications which will be filed with this board for the 11 forms of licenses to be granted in the District of Columbia. Somebody, surely not the committee, but some fine Italian hand downtown, has inserted in this bill a provision that everybody must give a surety bond by a surety company, a corporate surety bond. The applicant could not give a bond secured by real-estate owners or by the wealthiest man in the District of Columbia. The surety companies practicing in the District must get all of these bonds or none at all. I am sure if that monopoly were brought to the attention of the District Committee, the word "corporate" would have been stricken from the bill, and the ordinary security or surety that is taken in a court, or anywhere else, would be accepted from an applicant for a license under this bill.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to be heard on the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I would not think that ordinarily there would be any objection to the amendment, but inasmuch as we have proceeded as far as we have on this bill, I think the acceptance of this amendment would require several changes in the bill, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, to a large extent, should be qualified. For instance, we have tried in this bill to separate the retail licensee from the wholesaler as much as possible. We have tried to keep the licensee from having an interest in more than one place. The bonding provision, if not properly restricted, might permit a professional bondsman to obtain control of the situation. So that if we are going to take the amendment at all, I think the gentleman from New York should protect the bill from any such situation arising. It does not make any difference to us whether or not it is a corporate surety or an individual surety, except that in addition to the provisions of the bill the corporate surety is surrounded by other forms of public protection. There has been a great deal of evil due to the individual sureties. It makes no difference to us, except that it is late in the day and we have gone along on this bill on the basis I have stated, and if the gentleman is very anxious about his amendment the committee might accept it if the gentleman would modify the amendment to take care of the situation I have mentioned.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have examined the bill very carefully and I see nothing inconsistent with striking out the word "corporate." As to individuals going surety or bail for violations of the law you have provided for in another section.

Mr. BLACK. For instance, I want to point this out: Under the gentleman's amendment a distiller might be the bondsman for the applicant. That is entirely against the theory of this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no; that is provided for in another place. Every applicant could either take a corporate surety company as bondsman or furnish other bondsmen, but none of the bondsmen should be connected in any way with his business or the liquor business. This just means that you prevent a monopoly on the part of the surety companies here.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentlemen having this bill in charge will agree to the amendment. It is more or less unimportant, but it does do one thing: A small store is operated by a man, and that man owns his own property, and he can go there and, with the assistance of his wife and relatives, schedule a bond that will save him a few dollars in payment of premium on a corporate bond which would otherwise be necessary.

Mr. BLACK. I would be willing to suggest to the committee that it accept the amendment with a proviso providing that no surety shall have any financial interest in the business of the licensee.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no objection to that, but this is not the proper place for the amendment. This is a long section. The gentleman's amendment will not fit at this place.

Mr. BLACK. The suggestion has been made that the Committee vote down the O'Connor amendment and we shall offer later an amendment containing the restriction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOILEAU: Page 27, line 22, after the word "place", insert the following: "for which a license under this act has not been issued and in effect on the date the written objections hereinafter provided for are filed."

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee and the members of the committee to the provisions of subsection (c) of section 14, on page 27. This subsection provides that if a majority of the property owners within a radius of 600 feet of the place of business seeking a license object and file written objections with the commission that the license shall not be granted. In other words, it does not apply solely to the first licensing of the particular place of business, but it applies also to the licensing of the business in subsequent years.

For instance, if I were to start a restaurant, or if I, having a restaurant in a residential section, obtained a license to sell liquor for the first year and ran a good legitimate business, nevertheless a majority of the residents within a radius of 600 feet could prevent me from procuring a license the second year even though I may have put a tremendous amount of money into equipment.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. I think the situation the gentleman suggests is taken care of in the amendment referring to April 5, 1933. In other words, all who have licenses today obtained the licenses since April 5, and would not be subject to that proviso.

Mr. BOILEAU. I was so told by several members of the committee. If the gentleman refers to the language on page 11, I may say that this language, beginning in line 10, forbids the issuance of any class or classes of licenses for businesses established subsequent to April 5, 1933, conducted near or around schools, colleges, universities, churches, or public institutions. It does not take care of the situation I have brought up at all. I can find no language in the act that does take care of this situation. I am under the impression, and it seems very clear to me from the language of this subsection, that if a majority of the owners of property within a radius of 600 feet object to an individual having his license reissued for another year, they can prevent it, even though he may have conducted his business in a very decent way.

I believe the residents of a territory should have something to say about the first issuance of the license. For instance, now, before the licenses are issued, if the people in a residential section do not want restaurants, I believe they should have something to say about it. But, having permitted a man to establish such a business and invest a large amount of money in his business, it seems to me to be entirely wrong to permit some individual to buy a few pieces of property and thereby run this man out of business.

Mr. BRITTEN. As long as he maintains a perfectly respectable place of business.

Mr. BOILEAU. I believe that is taken care of in the provision of paragraph 5, on page 26, which provides that the place for which the license is to be issued must be an appropriate one, considering the character of the premises, its surroundings, and the wishes of the persons residing or owning property in the neighborhood of the premises for which the license is desired.

It seems to me this language conveys enough power upon the board to allow them to use their own judgment and use their own discretion. I do not believe any mandatory power should be given to a few people who own property in a particular neighborhood—because it is very easy for some person to come in there and buy up enough property to control the situation—to act to the detriment of a man who is conducting a legitimate business. We are putting the liquor business on a legitimate basis with proper regulations. I do not think we should have any legislation that would permit a little group of fanatics to exercise such arbitrary power.

I hope the committee will accept this amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, it would seem to the committee to be a reasonable amendment and the committee is inclined to agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 28, line 24, strike out the word "corporate" and on page 29, line 4, after the word "act", insert the following:

"Provided, That no such surety shall have, directly or indirectly, any financial interest in the business of the licensee."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand this amendment accomplishes in part the purpose of the amendment I just offered, but affords the protection suggested by the gentleman, namely, that the surety shall not be interested in the place he bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. Licenses issued hereunder shall not authorize the sale or delivery of beverages, with the exception of beer, to any person under the age of 21 years, or beer to any person under the age of 18 years, either for his own use or for the use of any other person; or the sale of beverages to any intoxicated person or to any person of notoriously intemperate habits or to any person who appears to be intoxicated; and ignorance of the age of any such minor shall not be a defense to any action instituted under this section. No licensee shall be liable to any person for damages claimed to arise from refusal to sell such alcoholic beverages.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 34, line 17, after the word "beer", insert the words "and light wines."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 18, after the word "beer", insert the words "or light wines."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. There shall be levied and collected by the District of Columbia on all beverages, except beer, manufactured by a holder of a manufacturer's license and on all beverages, except beer, purchased by the holder of a wholesaler's or retailer's license, except such beverages as may have been purchased from a licensee under this act, a tax of 50 cents for every wine gallon of wine containing more than 14 percent of alcohol by volume or champagne or any wine artificially carbonated, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for fractional parts thereof; a tax of 20 cents for every wine gallon of wine containing 14 percent or less of alcohol by volume, other than champagne or any wine artificially carbonated, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts thereof; a tax of 50 cents on every wine gallon of spirits, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts thereof; and a tax of $1.10 on every wine gallon of alcohol, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts thereof. The taxes imposed by this section shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia on or before the 15th day of each month for beverages manufactured by the holders of manufacturers' licenses or purchased by the holders of wholesalers' or retailers' licenses during the preceding calendar month, and such taxes shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia. No tax shall be levied and collected on any alcohol exempt from tax under the laws of the United States, or on any alcohol sold for nonbeverage purposes, in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Commissioners. If any act of Congress shall hereafter prescribe for a Federal volume tax on alcoholic beverages under which a portion of said tax shall be returned to the District of Columbia, the taxes levied under this section shall not be collected after the effective date of such act.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which I will send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BURNHAM: Strike out beginning with the figure "50", at line 7, page 36, and ending at the end of line 14, page 36, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "35 cents for every wine gallon of wine containing more than 14 percent of alcohol by volume, except champagne or any wine artificially carbonated, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for fractional parts thereof; a tax of 50 cents for every wine gallon of champagne or any wine artificially carbonated, and at a like rate for any other quantity or for the fractional parts thereof."

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is agreed to. The committee accepts the amendment.

Mr. McFARLANE. I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question. Will he explain the effect of his amendment and just how it compares with the liquor bill which was enacted last week concerning the tax on wines of various alcoholic content?

Mr. BURNHAM. I will say for the benefit of my colleague from Texas that this amendment provides for a tax of 35 cents per wine gallon on wines above 14 percent alcoholic content and 50 cents per wine gallon for champagne and carbonated wines. Wine below an alcoholic content of 14 percent will take the same tax as beer.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This is a local tax and is added to the Federal tax that was passed this week?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is a local tax entirely?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Does the gentleman's amendment lower the tax or raise it, as set forth in the District bill?

Mr. BURNHAM. It is a graduated scale. It leaves the rate of 50 cents for champagnes and carbonated wines and lowers the rate on ordinary wines above 14 percent from 50 cents to 35 cents.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is in line with the general opinion of the committee, that we should lower the tax on natural grape wine as much as we can in order to encourage the drinking of grape wine and get away from the drinking of hard liquor?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes. This is in addition to the Federal tax, you understand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. (a) No person shall in the District of Columbia drink any beverage in any street, alley, or publicly owned space, or in any vehicle upon the same, or in or upon any depot, platform, or waiting room of any public carrier, or in any hotel, restaurant, tavern, store, or place of business to which the public is invited, or at any public gathering, except that beverages may be drunk upon premises for which a retailer's license class C has been issued, and beer may be drunk upon premises for which a retailer's license class D has been issued. No person shall be drunk or intoxicated in any of the places (including vehicles) mentioned in this section or at any public gathering and no person shall be drunk or intoxicated and disturb the peace of any person anywhere.

(b) Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not more than 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

(c) Section 11 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1917, as amended by the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes", approved April 5, 1933, and section 20 of said act approved March 3, 1917, are hereby repealed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I sent to the desk an amendment. If the charming chairlady of the committee should feel it is too late in the day to consider it, that is satisfactory to me, but the purpose of my amendment was to strike out the first part of section 28.

I mentioned this matter before. The provision as carried into this act was taken bodily from the Prohibition Act of the District of Columbia of 1917. This provision makes it a crime, punishable by a jail sentence, if you take a drink in your own automobile; it makes it a crime for you to take a drink in a railroad station before taking a train. Those provisions were enacted when we had prohibition here in the District. The provision would even prohibit your taking a drink on a golf course or on your club grounds. In other words, you must go inside and hide yourself away in order to take a drink.

I do not believe it is intended, now that prohibition has been repealed, to make sneaks out of the American people. If I have liquor with me, whether I am ill or not, if I am waiting for a train in a railroad station and go into the men's room of the railroad station and take a drink of my own liquor, I can be arrested and sentenced to jail under this provision. What I should do is to sneak into a restaurant and take a drink by myself. Does not the Committee think that that provision has been unwisely injected into this bill? It is taken bodily, as the report shows, from the Prohibition Act of the District of Columbia of 1917, before we had national prohibition.

I call for a vote on my amendment to eliminate such a provision from the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, while it is not my purpose to agree with the gentleman from New York in every particular, I really think his point is well taken, and I have no objection to accepting the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page, 39, line 22, strike out all of section 28, down to and including the word "issued", in line 6, on page 40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. After the date of the approval of this act no permit shall be issued under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes", approved April 5, 1933, and no permits issued thereunder shall be renewed, but the Commissioners are hereby authorized to extend the expiration dates of permits issued under said act to a date designated by them, not to exceed 60 days after the approval of the act, upon such terms and conditions, including the payment of such fees as the Commissioners may prescribe. Any permittee thereunder may make an application for a license under this act, and, if said application is approved by the board, such permittee shall surrender his permit and he shall be allowed a refund of the permit fee prorated as hereinafter provided. Any permittee under said act of April 5, 1933, may surrender his permit and receive a refund of the permit fee prorated from the date of surrender of such permit to the date of expiration thereof. All such refunds shall be paid from the permanent indefinite appropriation for refunding erroneously paid taxes in the District of Columbia. All permits issued under said act of April 5, 1933, shall remain in force and effect for the respective periods for which they were issued unless sooner surrendered.

The said act approved April 5, 1933, shall stand repealed 1 year from the date of approval of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 46, line 8, after the word "surrendered", insert "after the approval of this act no taxes shall be collected under section 11 of the act approved April 5, 1933."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 34. All laws which prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages in certain defined sections or parts of the District of Columbia are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 47, after line 15, insert:

"SEC. 35. No holder of a retailer's license, except a retailer's license class E, shall sell on credit any beverages except beer and light wines. This section shall not prohibit a club from extending credit to its members or the guests of members or a hotel from extending credit to its registered guests.

"SEC. 36. No rectified or blended spirits shall be sold unless the container in which it is sold shall bear a legible label firmly affixed thereto stating the nature and percentage of each ingredient therein, the age of each such ingredient, and the alcoholic content of such spirits by volume."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 35. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 48, line 3, strike out "35" and insert "37."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 40, line 8, for the purpose of offering a clarifying amendment to section 28, by striking out the word "section" and inserting therefor the word "act." The preceding language has been stricken out and there are no "places" referred to in the section, but there are in the act.

Mrs. NORTON. There is no objection to that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KENNEY: Page 40, line 8, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to the bill?

Mr. PATMAN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PATMAN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question was taken; and a division was demanded by Mr. PATMAN.

Mr. PATMAN (while the House was dividing). Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mrs. NORTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D.C., January 8, 1934.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SPEAKER RAINEY: I hereby tender to you my resignation as a member of the following committees of the House, namely, Military Affairs, Elections No. 2, and Revision of the Laws.

Respectfully,

THOMAS C. COCHRAN.

The resignations were accepted.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 216

Resolved, That THOMAS C. COCHRAN, of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MULDOWNEY (at the request of Mr. DARROW), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. SWEENEY (at the request of Mr. TRUAX), indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of Mrs. Sweeney.

DISPENSING WITH BUSINESS ON CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is Calendar Wednesday, and I move that Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. DOUGHTON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may sit during the sessions of the House in considering the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee inform us what is to be taken up tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. I think the Appropriations Committee will report the independent offices bill, and it is proposed to call it up tomorrow for consideration for general debate only.

Mr. SNELL. I understand there will be nothing but general debate on the bill tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. I so understand. It will not be printed and so will not be taken up under the 5-minute rule until Members have had a chance to examine it.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

268. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations pertaining to the legislative establishment, House of Representatives, for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935, in the sum of $4,000 (H.Doc. No. 213); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

269. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting reports of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1933 on the subjects of Federal-aid road work, forest roads and trails, and sale of waste paper; to the Committee on Roads.

270. A letter from the chairman of the Advisory Committee of Department of Commerce, transmitting the Seventeenth Annual Report of the United States Shipping Board, covering the period from July 1, 1932, to and including June 30, 1933 (H.Doc. No. 124); to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries and ordered to be printed.

271. A letter from the chairman of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, transmitting report of the operations of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933 (H.Doc. No. 140); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, creator of all things, by whose eternal thought the worlds are upheld and of whose infinite bounty we all partake, make our hearts simple and trustful, that in the brightness of this new morning we may share with Thee in humble fellowship Thy majesty and glory.

Give us this day, O Father, life that is strong and triumphant, life that is joyous and free, that fearlessly and honestly we may seek the truth and by our high endeavor master the difficulties of these overburdened hours.

Thou who art Lord of every land and tongue, give to all the nations prosperity and peace; teach us by Thy spirit the universal language of Thy love, that every corner of the earth may be filled with light and gladness, and at the door of every heart the King of Glory may find entrance. We ask it in the name of Him who is Thy love made manifest, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

House Joint Memorial 4, a memorial to the President of the United States and Congress of the United States relating to the condition of agriculture within the United States

Whereas a most critical condition exists in the United States, many farmers in this State are in grave danger of losing their homes; the condition of the agricultural interests of the United States are in so grave a condition as to amount to a national calamity; and

Whereas the products raised by the farming population of the State of Montana and other States of the Northwest are only produced at a loss by such farmers; and

Whereas we believe that the condition can only be remedied by some action upon the part of the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to the end that prices of agricultural commodities be fixed at a price at least equal to the cost of production and enough profit that those engaged in farming may live; and

Whereas it appears that the various industries of the United States are being organized under codes to protect the rights of such industries and the workers in the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Montana (the senate concurring), That the President of the United States and Congress take such steps as may be necessary to secure the adoption of a code for and by farmers which will permit the fixing of prices so as to relieve this very serious condition; and that if same cannot be done without further legislation, that Congress shall pass such legislation as will enable the agricultural interests to combine under a code and into an association or associations that the price of our agricultural products may be fixed for the welfare of the agricultural population and the entire Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Montana transmit a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States and that he also transmit copies thereof to each Senator and Representative at Washington from the State of Montana.

D. A. DELLWO,
Speaker of the House.

House Joint Memorial 5, a memorial to the President of the United State of America requesting an investigation of water control of the Yellowstone River in Yellowstone Park

To the honorable PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

Whereas during parts of the months of June and July of each year the flow of water in the Yellowstone River is greatly augmented by the melting of snow, causing serious damage to farms bordering on said river by the washing away of the banks and encroaching on valuable tillable land, the menacing and destruction of irrigation headgates, bridges, and other structures along the course of said Yellowstone River, and adding to the excessive flow of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers during the high-water stage of same; and

Whereas if the flow during the period mentioned could be partially impounded and allowed to escape at a later period, it would very largely prevent the damage as before related; and

Whereas if the waters of Yellowstone Lake were held at a fairly constant level and allowed to flow at the period when the flow of the river is lowest, namely, during the later days of July and all of August, it would add greatly to the beauty of the falls, and would make the lake more attractive by keeping mud banks covered with water; and

Whereas we, your memorialists, believe that an investigation by competent engineers will corroborate our belief and show that such works are feasible and can be constructed at moderate cost: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully urged to consider the facts set forth herein, that same be investigated promptly, and that such action be taken as you may deem wise and proper; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Montana transmit a copy of said memorial to the President of the United States, and that he also transmit copies thereof to each Senator and Representative at Washington, D.C., from the State of Montana, with a request that they cooperate in seeing that this matter be brought to the personal attention of the President of the United States.

H. Cooney, Governor of said State, on the 22d day of December 1933.

Senate Joint Memorial 1, to the President and to the Congress of the United States, requesting the establishing of an assay office at some appropriate point in the State of Montana

To the President and the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the members of the Twenty-third Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby respectfully represent that:

Whereas Montana has been one of the large gold-producing States and the decline in the marketing of gold which resulted in the removal of the old assay office in Montana was general throughout the United States because of interest for many years being centered in the mining of other metals and the mining of gold was not generally profitable, and

Whereas since the beginning of the present economic crisis, and especially since the release of the embargo upon the marketing of gold, the mining of that metal has become more profitable and is now of especial importance as an occupation for thousands of unemployed, during the past seasons, and more particularly at the present time, hundreds of men and boys, and even women, have engaged and are now engaged in placer mining with a shovel and pan or with other crude methods handed down from the early placer miners and have thereby been able to take from the soil free gold in quantities ranging from a few cents in value up to substantial amounts, these people have been able to keep partially or entirely out of the bread line, and it is in keeping with the spirit of the National Recovery Act to afford to them every opportunity to gain an independent livelihood in this manner, and

Whereas in marketing their product through the avenues now open to them these miners are deprived of a great deal of the benefit of their industry in that there are weeks of delay in obtaining settlement for their product. Forms which baffle even a lawyer must be filled out and are usually returned two or three times for correction, or the miner must find some other method of marketing his product which also deprives him of the full benefit of the Government price, and

Whereas under the existing regulations which limit the purchase by the Government to 2 ounces of fine gold in one shipment, a man producing less than that amount must combine with others or wait for weeks or months to accumulate 2 ounces of gold before they can receive any benefit from it, or he will dispose of it for what he can get quickly, as he needs the money for immediate necessities, and

Whereas these considerations also apply to the small operators who are employing men and are seeking to establish mining operations on a larger scale and who are recovering their gold in bulk or bullion form. The ready sale of their product is necessary to maintain their operations and there is no reason why they should not receive the full Government price for their metal instead of being subjected to the charges of intermediary purchasers or sales agents amounting to around 10 percent as a rule: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (and by the house of representatives concurred) That appropriate action be taken by Congress, if necessary, and by the President if he is now authorized to do so by law, for the establishment at some appropriate point in Montana most convenient to the gold-producing territory, an assay office where gold in quantities from half an ounce up may be sold by producers to the Government at the full market price and settlement therefor made promptly as in the days when the United States assay office was maintained at the capital of the State: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Montana is hereby directed to forward to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana copies of this memorial.

R. PAULINE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Senate Joint Memorial 3, a memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and Chief Forester of the United States

Whereas it appears that the allocation of men to civil-works projects on national forests has so far been confined by the Civil Works Administration at Washington to 25 men; and

Whereas we are informed that it had been previously estimated that nearly 12,000 men would be employed in Montana, northern Idaho, eastern Washington, and western South Dakota, and that this order was made in the belief that by reason of the civil-works program in Montana work in the forests would not be necessary; and that

Whereas after all men now receiving relief are employed, which will be employed under the civil-works program, there will remain 4,000 men in the State of Montana unemployed who are now on relief and 30,000 men out of employment registered with the employment service and seeking employment, and most of whom will require employment or relief during the winter; that

Whereas several thousand of these men would be employed on civil-works projects in national forests within the State of Montana if said work were not discontinued, and that it is necessary in order to provide work, food, and clothing for men within the State of Montana that said work in the national forests be continued during the coming winter, and that plans of the Forest Service have already been completed so that these men might be immediately put to work in such Service: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (house of representatives concurring), That the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chief Forester of the United States are respectfully urged to revoke the order discontinuing said civil works on national forests within the State of Montana, and that said works continue as heretofore planned, and that during the coming winter there be employed in said projects within the State of Montana as many men from said State as can be employed to carry out said projects planned; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Montana transmit a copy of said memorial to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Chief Forester of the United States, and that he also transmit copies thereof to each Senator and Representative from the State of Montana at Washington, D.C., with a request that they render all assistance possible to the end that the civil-works program within the State of Montana continue its program of civil works in the national forest within the State of Montana during the present winter and employ as many men as is possible from the State of Montana in said works during said period.

STATE OF MONTANA,
DEPARTMENT SECRETARY OF STATE,
Helena, January 4, 1934.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

SIR: In accordance with the mandate of the extraordinary session of Montana's Twenty-third Legislative Assembly, I have the honor to enclose a certified copy of Senate Joint Memorial No. 4 and express the request that you render all assistance possible, to the end that this matter be brought to the personal attention of the President of the United States.

Very truly yours,

SAM W. MITCHELL,
Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, Sam W. Mitchell, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the following is a true and correct copy of an act entitled "Senate Joint Memorial No. 4, a memorial to the President of the United States relating to the administration of Federal farm loans by the Federal land bank located at Spokane, Wash., and other agencies in relation to loans upon farms within the State of Montana", enacted by the extraordinary twenty-third session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana and approved by F. H. Cooney, Governor of said State, on the 1st day of January 1934.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State.

Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 3d day of January, A.D. 1934.

[SEAL] SAM W. MITCHELL,
Secretary of State.

Senate Joint Memorial 4, a memorial to the President of the United States relating to the administration of Federal farm loans by the Federal land bank located at Spokane, Wash., and other agencies in relation to loans upon farms within the State of Montana

Whereas a most critical condition exists in the United States, and many farmers in this State are in grave danger of losing their homes; and

Whereas we appreciate all that the President of the United States is doing in their behalf and we express our full faith and confidence in his aims and program to aid and relieve our farming population; and

Whereas the Federal farm loans in the State of Montana have been made through the Federal land bank of Spokane, Wash.; and

Whereas it appears that said Federal land bank is unjustly discriminating against the farmers and ranchers of the State of Montana in that said land bank has almost ceased to function as an active agency in the State of Montana and has encouraged farmers and ranchers in this State to make applications for loans and such applications have been made at great inconvenience and expense and large numbers of loans have been requested, the security being adequate to warrant such loans, and that said applications have been delayed for long periods of time and finally rejected without any good reason for such rejection; and

Whereas said land bank has adopted a policy of requiring citizens of this State to include within the security given for their loans mortgages on livestock owned by such applicants and has required the execution of mortgages on real estate and chattel mortgages, where loans have been granted, in an arbitrary manner, so as to encumber all liquid assets of borrowers and leave them helpless and unable to proceed in a reasonable manner to support themselves or families; and

Whereas we believe that the regulations and requirements of said land bank as it functions in the State of Montana are wholly unreasonable and discriminatory against the citizens of this State and that same are being administered harshly and with no consideration to the welfare of this State or its citizens, and that by reason of the fact that the Federal land bank is located without the State and is not interested in the welfare of the citizens of this State, and that the law authorizing these Federal farm loans as at present administered within the State of Montana is of no benefit to the citizens of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolve by the Senate of the State of Montana (the house of representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully urged to consider the facts set forth herein, that same be investigated promptly, and that an agency be established within the State of Montana to serve the people of this State, and that the Federal land bank at Spokane be required to modify its rules and regulations to permit such consideration as is within the purpose and intent of the law and the liberal policy advocated and approved by the President of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of Montana transmit a copy of said memorial to the President of the United States and that he also transmit copies thereof to each Senator and Representative at Washington from the State of Montana, with a request that they cooperate in seeing that this matter be brought to the personal attention of the President of the United States.

R. PAULINE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
D. A. DELLWO,
Speaker of the House.

EIGHTH OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY, SPANISH WAR

Mr. BULKLEY. I present a brief and petition from officers of the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, together with a supplementary statement of Gen. Charles W. Dick, of Akron, Ohio, a former Senator from Ohio. I have had the pleasure of presenting the original signed copies to the President of the United States. I ask that the matter presented by me may be printed at this point in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the brief and petition were referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF AND PETITION SUBMITTED FOR CONSIDERATION BY THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS, THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, AND PENSION DIVISION THEREOF

We, the undersigned, who served as officers of the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, respectfully submit the following statement to the pension division, Veterans' Administration, and request its consideration in adjustment of the claims of veterans of our regiment:

The Eight Ohio Volunteer Infantry was an old-established National Guard regiment which had maintained a high standard in personnel and efficiency through all the years.

The regiment was mobilized at Akron, Ohio, April 25, 1898; ordered to Camp Bushnell, Columbus, Ohio, where it was given rigid physical examination and mustered into United States service. After being mustered, it was ordered to Camp Alger, Va.

Camp Alger was badly located. There was lack of water fit for drinking and cooking purposes. The camp was 10 miles from the Potomac River and there was nothing between camp and the river except the distance which we had to travel to take a bath.

These conditions soon developed much sickness, typhoid fever, dysentery, and a long list of ailments, which nearly became epidemic. After we left for Santiago, the camp was abandoned.

The ambulance, medicine chests, and medical instruments issued to us by the State of Ohio were ordered turned over to headquarters medical staff on our arrival at Camp Alger and their return was refused when we were ordered to Santiago de Cuba, so that our supply of medicine consisted of just what each doctor had in his handcase.

Our first requisition for medicine in Cuba was refused because it had not been approved by our brigade commander, Gen. George A Garrettson, who was in Puerto Rico, and our regiment had at that time 800 sick men on our morning reports.

Our surgeons, three of them, were active practitioners of excellent standing and long service, but when confronted with tropical diseases concerning which they knew little they could render small relief; in fact, they were themselves soon physically unable to do anything. All three have been dead many years; the senior surgeon, Dr. E. C. Farquhar, died very soon after returning to his home at Zanesville.

Our equipment was wholly unsuited for tropical service and was a serious handicap to all, both well and sick.

Our rations were so bad they created a national scandal. We were ordered not to eat native fruits. We were issued meat twice, and both times it was ordered buried by the surgeons. It was impossible to get anything that was fit for a sick man to eat at a time when two thirds of that Army was on its back and the remaining third were physically unable to administer to them.

Nothing herein stated is intended as criticism. The campaign was an emergency which had to be met and which we encountered wholly unprepared but, above all, let it be remembered, through no fault of the men who were sent into that service.

Now, we who went through that campaign and are now witnessing the fearful death rate of our comrades feel keenly regarding the welfare of these comrades remaining among us. We know their service is responsible for their present condition, which ranges between total disability and far below normal. Such service could not help but leave its permanent mark upon their physical constitution. We believe the present condition of these men and the sacrifices they made, and are still making, should materially temper any further demands upon them.

We have reason to believe beyond doubt that other organizations which served with us in the Santiago campaign are today in similar condition, due mainly to our having to undertake tropical service before the Nation was prepared to provide otherwise—a provision the essential character of which our service and its costs in lives and health so fearfully demonstrated.

The lessons our Government learned from our costly experience in Cuba can never be compensated for in money, however generously such compensation may justly be made to finally prevail.

Our appeal is in behalf of those with whom we served, men whom we know and have known approximately for half a century; men as brave, patriotic, and loyal as ever marched to war.

We sadly survey their present condition and contemplate their future with great concern and deepest sympathy.

For them and their comrades we seek justice, humane consideration, and fair treatment for the sacrifices they have made, and for the penalties, the physical and material consequences from the day they were mustered out to the present.

Charles W. Dick, lieutenant colonel;; Marquis A. Charlton, captain; H. O. Feederle, captain; Tully O. Deibler, captain; Kiser W. Taylor, first lieutenant; Frank C. Gerlach, captain; William E. Barnard, first lieutenant; Dudley J. Hard, first lieutenant; Orlando R. Edwards, second lieutenant; Edgar E. Brosius, first lieutenant; George Heer, second lieutenant; William M. Burson, first lieutenant; Andrew T. Weybrecht, second lieutenant; Ammon B. Critchfield, captain; Joseph W. Young, second lieutenant; Charles H. Hughes, first lieutenant; Gustave W. Unger, second lieutenant; James O. Campbell, chaplain; Charles F. Schaber, second lieutenant; Herbert S. Spidel, first lieutenant; Elliott L. Gyger, captain; John W. Birk, first lieutenant; Geo. O. Anderson, first lieutenant; C. S. Hoover, second lieutenant; Wilbert A. Hobbs, surgeon; W. O. Rutherford, second lieutenant; being the remaining living officers of the regiment when mustered into the United States service for the Cuban campaign now available.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT

Attached hereto is the statement of living officers of the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, whose signatures are now available. The following declarations offer added facts bearing on the situation disclosed in the brief above referred to, few of which, if any, are likely to have been included in official reports.

In addition to the officers commanding the various groups are the signatures of the chaplain, Rev. James O. Campbell, and the one living surgeon, Dr. W. A. Hobbs. It seems reasonable to repeat the obvious truth that my acquaintance with all these men who have signed the brief covers a period of more than 35 years prior to and following the time when we were comrades in the same regiment rendering service to our country during the War with Spain.

Although I did not witness the signing of the document by each and all of these officers I feel fully qualified to verify their signatures, individually and collectively, as being genuine, made without undue influence, and free from mental reservation.

Furthermore, there has not come to my attention one word of criticism respecting the statements therein made. No qualification has been urged except in one instance where it was suggested that certain matters might be more strongly emphasized.

Again, having known these men through a period of many years in time of war and in peace, I know of no single act that would in any degree disqualify any one of them in making any statement, although made in their own behalf. All of them are men of integrity, honesty, and reputation of such character as would place each and all beyond challenge.

In other words, the statement, to my mind and to my way of thinking, is as valid and binding as if an oath sustaining the brief to which they have attached their signatures had been administered to each and every one and should be so received and accepted.

Because of peculiar personal experiences bearing on the brief submitted and to which my own signature is written, I submit additional personal testimony to which I give my signature and further substantiation by oath, administered by one duly authorized to execute the same.

When the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry was ordered to Camp Alger I was sent to Falls Church, Va., in advance to select ground on which the regiment was to pitch its camp. Ours was the first regiment to occupy any part of that area subsequently known as "Camp Alger." I then made protest to the officer in charge, Major Ural, concerning the water supply. Up to the time that our regiment left for Cuba nothing worth while had been done to better that situation. Many of our men were ill before we left Camp Alger, largely due to the poor and inadequate water supply.

When the regiment left for Cuba under emergency orders our equipment was faulty in every respect. We reached Cuba during the rainy season at a time of year which is most dangerous even to natives and people acclimated to tropical conditions. Serious sickness began to increase shortly after our landing at Siboney. Rain fell in torrents every day. Intense heat ranging above 100° F. was another daily experience. Impenetrable fogs prevailed at night. Chilling atmosphere obtained from midnight until morning. Our men wore uniforms that would have been suitable in wintertime even in the United States. We were without proper medicines or medical and surgical equipment of any sort. Our rations were of unsatisfactory and unsanitary quality. We were without hospital supplies or requirements and none were obtainable until days after the surrender at Santiago de Cuba.

Conferences had with many officers, including Generals Henry, Bates, Kent, Miles, and Colonel Wood, Spanish officers, Cuban officers, a priest at the cathedral who was a former resident of Toledo, Ohio, and others, brought out the extent of most alarming conditions threatening our soldiers who were wholly unacclimated and unprepared.

Dealing next with an experience of our regiment, following an order issued by the War Department and transmitted to us by General Shafter, the organization was isolated for a period of 10 days, after which the regiment should be sent to Puerto Rico where, so the Department order stated, it was needed. This had been requested by General Miles. These orders were strictly followed, the regiment was duly isolated, the most rigid instructions were obediently followed, to the end that we might participate in the Puerto Rican campaign.

After 10 days General Shafter sent an Army surgeon to make the required inspection. The verbal report made to me by the surgeon as he finished his task was to the effect that more than 300 men of the regiment were ill with yellow fever.

These conditions not only with respect to our regiment but equally with the entire Army, so reports showed, grew constantly worse until it was roughly estimated that two thirds of that Army was on its back and the other third were scarcely able to take care of them.

General Henry said to me as he was leaving for Puerto Rico, "Dick, history will prove to you, now reinforced by your experience, that the Province of Santiago at this season of the year has ever been the 'pest hole' of all creation."

When I reported to General Shafter's headquarters in Santiago de Cuba at his request, I met Col. Theodore Roosevelt by chance as he was leaving the meeting of general officers who had been considering the situation and had cabled a strong petition to the War Department. He said to me that I had been unanimously chosen by the officers attending that meeting to proceed at once to Washington and report in person to the President and the Secretary of War the direful situation of the Army at Santiago de Cuba and the urgent importance of its withdrawal because of the prevailing sickness among the men. He had been urged to perform that mission, but he told me he said to the assembled officers there was a man in that Army whom the administration at Washington would believe and that was Dick, of the Eighth Ohio, and he urged and recommended my selection. I then protested to Roosevelt and Shafter that I preferred to remain in Cuba with my regiment, but they insisted I could do more to help by going. I finally said to General Shafter I was ready to obey orders, and it was so ordered.

Just inside the hallway of Army headquarters I talked with General Wheeler, who, in discussing the situation, pronounced it "hellish." I found General Shafter greatly distressed by the alarming conditions. He ordered me to report early next morning prepared to go from Santiago to New Orleans on the steamer Berlin with a bale of papers, maps, and other information for the War Department and the President. On parting with him to take ship the next morning General Shafter said to me: "You may say to the President for me that if necessary we can stay here and die, but the war on the island is over and the early return of these men to the States will save not hundreds but thousands of human lives in this Army."

On leaving the palace, which was occupied by General Shafter and his staff as Army headquarters, I crossed the plaza to get a glimpse of the interior of the ancient cathedral directly opposite the palace. While looking at the frescoes I felt a hand resting on my shoulder, and, turning, I found myself face to face with a priest. In well-spoken English he asked me if I was an officer of the Army, and I answered affirmatively. He asked my name, rank, and regiment. When I told him, I was amazed to have him speak familiarly of Ohio affairs, when he, noting my surprise, told me he had once served a parish in Toledo. Almost instantly upon my identification he said: "Colonel, if you have influence with the administration at Washington, get this Army out of here at the earliest moment possible, for if they remain here much longer under existing climatic conditions without proper shelter and supplies, they will die like flies." This priest was a competent witness. When that Army evacuated Cuba his words were all but prophecy.

On reaching Washington and after reporting in detail to President McKinley and Secretary of War Alger, the President directed the Secretary to issue orders for the immediate return of the Army at Santiago de Cuba and for replacements by immunes.

The President in commenting—the Secretary of War agreeing—freely stated they had no previous conception of the serious conditions obtaining in the Army in Cuba until they heard my verbal report and had examined the maps and papers I had brought for their more comprehensive information.

No man who has not gone through these same experiences can fully understand what havoc and distress that campaign, under circumstances above described, has wrought to these unfortunate veterans with consequences in later life that are, of course, not susceptible to accurate measure.

I offer these incidents as proof of what the leaders in that campaign thought of the gravity and seriousness of the situation at that time.

In view of the statements made in the brief submitted by the officers of the regiment and these which I have personally added, and the difficulty in securing and submitting satisfactory supporting evidence as proof in the establishment of disability due to service origin, we appeal for broad and liberal construction of the laws, rules, and regulations dealing with pensions not only of the men of our regiment but of all soldiers participating in that campaign.

Another difficulty to which we invite your attention is the fact that approximately half the men of our regiment are dead. Another considerable percentage are scattered in all parts of the country. But even where they are grouped together it is extremely difficult to recall important occurrences 35 years after they occurred, hence the impossibility in securing satisfactory evidence supporting or proving disabilities to be due to service origin.

A brief quotation from the record shows that the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry was organized April 26, 1898, at Akron, moved to Columbus April 28. Mustered in United States service May 13. Moved to New York June 8 and embarked for Cuba. Landed at Siboney, Cuba, July 11. Encamped on Sevilla Hill July 16. Camped on San Juan Hill August 11. Embarked for Montauk Point, N.Y., August 17. Arrived at their homes in Ohio September 8. Furloughed until November 10. Mustered out November 21, 1898. Actual days of service were 133. Total sick in general hospital, 650 out of 1,200 men. Deaths, 72. The death rate per 1,000 per year in the United States for all ages for the year 1898 was 16.2 persons; the death rate per 1,000 per year for the Eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry for ages 18 to 25 for the year 1898 was 164.2 persons, or 10 times the normal death rate.

We therefore feel fully justified in appealing to officials who deal with these matters to grant broadest consideration to our comrades who are still with us, and for their dependents. Likewise for the widows and children whom our dead comrades believed were secure from poverty by generous treatment at the hands of the Government they served and for which they offered their lives in time of war. All this was promised them when they enlisted for the war. The pension policy of the United States for a century and a half was of itself an implied if not unequivocal guarantee of such security. A just government cannot now, a third of a century later, repudiate such obligations with honor.

Respectfully submitted.

MEMORIALS OF MICHIGAN MUNICIPAL LEAGUE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, recently the representatives of 100 Michigan municipalities met at the State capital and adopted 4 memorials addressed to Congress, which I submit and ask that they be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the memorials in the form of resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to committees, as follows:

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

MUNICIPAL SHORT-TERM CREDIT

Whereas there is no market through normal financial channels for short-term notes and warrants even for cities and villages in sound financial condition; and

Whereas this lack of credit cripples and in many instances results in the abolition of municipal services, throwing men out of work at a time when the Federal Government is increasing employment; and

Whereas the cities and villages of Michigan and other governmental units have sound assets in the form of delinquent taxes which can be pledged as security: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League request the President to create a municipal credit corporation from which municipalities can borrow on reasonable security.

Passed unanimously January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich.

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

REFUNDING MUNICIPAL DEBT

Whereas there are many cities and villages and other governmental units in Michigan in default on their bonded debt; and

Whereas there is no existing legislation which will permit municipal governments to bring about an adjustment of their debts with their creditors except with the unanimous consent thereof; and

Whereas it is our belief that both cities and creditors will continue to suffer hardship unless some definite legal manner is provided for the adjustment of municipal debts: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League, composed of cities and villages in the State of Michigan, favor the enactment of the Summers-Wilcox bill now before Congress, which will permit cities through the Federal courts, with the consent of their creditors, to readjust their debts on the basis of their ability to pay.

Passed unanimously January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich.

To the Committee on Finance:

FEDERAL AID FOR PUBLIC WORKS

Whereas we believe sound public works to be a most important part of the national-recovery program; and

Whereas Michigan, hampered by statutory and constitutional restrictions, has been unable to take advantage of Federal aid for public works; and

Whereas only approximately half of the applications presented to the State advisory board on public works have been forwarded to Washington; and

Whereas it appears that the public-works fund is nearly exhausted, a major part of which has been allotted to Federal projects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League request the President and the Congress to appropriate additional funds to non-Federal public works.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be presented to the President and to Michigan's Representatives in Congress.

Passed unanimously January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich.

CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Whereas the C.W.A., through decentralized administration, has promptly given employment to many who were recipients of public relief and to others destitute but not yet on relief; and

Whereas business has been thus stimulated by the distribution of purchasing power, resulting in a more hopeful and optimistic attitude generally; and

Whereas the brief experience thus far with civil works has proved it to be an effective agent for national recovery and at the same time creating many needed and useful works which would otherwise have been neglected; and

Whereas the present allotment of men to Michigan is approximately one fifth of the registered unemployed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League request Congress not only to continue the present C.W.A. program but to materially expand it as a supplement to relief and public-works appropriations.

Carried unanimously, January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich.

PROPERTY OF MOUNT PLEASANT INDIAN SCHOOL, MICHIGAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, under the economy bill last year the Indian school at Mount Pleasant, Mich., was abandoned, and all of the Indians have been placed in the regular educational system. It has now become very desirable for the State of Michigan officially to take over this Indian school property and amalgamate it into the institutional system of the State of Michigan. I am, therefore, introducing a bill for that purpose with the entire consent of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Department of the Interior. I urge the emergency nature of the situation, with a request for the earliest possible action by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2152) granting certain property to the State of Michigan for institutional purposes was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JOHN C. MERRIAM

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read. Then I shall ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 70) to provide for the reappointment of John C. Merriam as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the term of John C. Merriam, of the city of Washington, on December 20, 1933, be filled by the reappointment of the recent incumbent John C. Merriam for the statutory term of 6 years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not understand that the Senator from Arkansas made a request for immediate consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. I see no emergency. I think the joint resolution should go over for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON or Arkansas. May I state for the RECORD some information which I think the Senate would like to have? I do not believe that the Senator from Oregon will persist in his objection when the information has been supplied.

John C. Merriam is a native of the State of Iowa. He is a very eminent scientist; professor of paleontology and dean of faculties in the University of California; president of the Carnegie Institution of Washington since 1921; member of the National Academy of Sciences, of which he was vice president and member of council; president of the Geological Society of America; member of numerous scientific societies here and abroad; a research authority on fossil mammalia, especially of the United States, and quite prominent in educational affairs.

Mr. Merriam's term on the board of regents expired December 20, 1933; and, the Congress not being in session, no opportunity arose for the immediate filling of the vacancy. Of course, if the Senator from Oregon desires to persist in his objection, I shall not press the matter at this time.

Mr. McNARY. The biography of Mr. Merriam is very interesting, but it bears no relation to any emergency. For that reason, since it is my policy to object in such cases, I must insist on my objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution will lie on the table.

FOREIGN FOOD PRODUCTS PURCHASED BY WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 125), as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that during the year 1933 large amounts of foreign food products were purchased under the direction of the Secretary of War for use in supplying rations to the Army and the Civilian Conservation Corps; and

Whereas there appeared in the Washington Herald for the morning of January 9, 1934, the following article:

"ARMY AND C.C.C. TO 'EAT AMERICAN'

"The Army and the C.C.C. will consume American products only this year.

"Last spring considerable Argentine beef was purchased, but Assistant Secretary of War Woodring assured President Roosevelt yesterday that this won't happen again.

"The 'doughboys' will also get more cheese this year. In response to the demands of dairy interests, the Army will purchase 1,000,000 pounds for rations": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested to transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, a report showing the amounts of foreign beef and other foreign food products purchased by the War Department since March 4, 1933, for the use of the Army and the Civilian Conservation Corps, and the prices paid therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, can the Senator from Indiana inform the Senate whether purchases of foreign products for food purposes by the War Department were made prior to March 4, 1933?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I cannot, Mr. President. I am willing to have the resolution amended, if the Senator desires it, to include the time before March 4, 1933.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not know myself what the facts are.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not know, I am sure. I just understood that this report had been made by the Secretary of War to the President that no more foreign food would be bought by the War Department, and that is why I thought the Senate ought to know how much of it has been bought by the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. The Senator would not object to the resolution going over until tomorrow so that I may examine it and see if I desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over under the rule until tomorrow.

REPORTS OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 126), as follows:

Whereas Executive Order No. 6548, dated January 3, 1934, has been revoked and an Executive order in lieu thereof issued, reading, in part, as follows: "It is hereby ordered that all executive departments (other than the Treasury Department), independent establishments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the United States, including corporations without capital stock which are owned by the Government and corporations with capital stock of which 50 percent or more is owned by the Government, except corporations which were in existence prior to January 1, 1932, shall hereafter submit to the Director of the Budget a weekly report containing an itemized statement of all allocations of funds made during the preceding week out of any emergency appropriation or other available emergency fund, and a weekly report containing an itemized statement of all obligations incurred during the preceding week for the expenditure of any emergency appropriation or other available emergency fund. Such reports shall include the allocation of funds and the incurring of obligations through the issuance of securities. The Director of the Budget shall keep a current compilation and tabulation of the above-mentioned allocations and obligations so reported and from time to time make such recommendations thereon to the President as he may deem advisable ":

Resolved, That a copy of all said reports furnished the Director of the Budget be filed with the Secretary of the Senate for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that it has been requested that my resolution lie over until tomorrow, I wish to make a brief explanation of it. I did not intend to make any remarks at this time, but I think the Senate should have some information which they can use to consider the merits of the resolution.

As I say, I did not intend to explain the resolution; but I think I will take this opportunity of making some remarks relative to the merits of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senator from Iowa the fact that there is nothing before the Senate. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] intends to move the consideration of a bill. If that is done, of course, the Senator from Iowa then will have an opportunity to make the statement he has in mind.

Mr. DICKINSON. Very well.

AMERICAN NATIONAL MARITIME BOARD

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 122, submitted by Mr. JOHNSON on the 8th instant, as follows:

Whereas the development and successful operation of an American merchant marine is, to a very large degree, based upon intelligent cooperation and good will between managers of operation and the personnel aboard the ships; and

Whereas the value of such cooperation and desirability of establishing and maintaining such harmonious relations has been fully recognized by two of the world's great maritime nations, Great Britain and Japan, in each of which national maritime boards have been organized jointly by shipowners and seamen for the express purpose of securing cooperation and fostering the sea power and the maritime supremacy of the respective nations; and

Whereas cooperation and the promotion of harmonious relations between American shipowners and American seamen could be obtained by means of an American national maritime board with the following objects and purposes:

(a) The development of seamanship, skill, and efficiency.

(b) The prevention and adjustment of differences between shipowners and seamen of all ratings.

(c) The establishment, revision, and maintenance of standard rates of wages and approved conditions of employment in the merchant marine.

(d) The selection and, when possible, the operation of employment offices for seamen in cooperation with the United States Departments of Commerce and Labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, the Secretary of the Department of Labor, and the Postmaster General be, and they are hereby, requested to confer upon the advisability of initiating an American national maritime board, as herein outlined, and for that purpose to call into conference such representatives of shipowners and seamen as may, in their judgment, be helpful in the formation of such an organization, and to report their proceedings and their conclusions to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California permit an inquiry? Is the Senator advised as to the attitude of Mr. Furuseth, head of the seamen's organization, with respect to this movement?

Mr. JOHNSON. That organization is favorable to it.

Mr. KING. Is there any organization now in any of the departments of the Government that can or would accomplish the results sought here?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as I read the resolution, it is a mere invitation or suggestion to the three Cabinet members named to make the investigation and report indicated in the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Purely a request that they confer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator advise us whether or not there will be included in this matter any question relating to subsidy?

Mr. JOHNSON. There was no such design.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to secure the entry of an order. Within the past 7 or 8 months there have been referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary a large number of telegrams and letters, possibly in all a thousand or more, relating to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Upon a perusal of these documents it is obvious that these telegrams and letters, in the nature of petitions, should be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and not to the Committee on the Judiciary. I therefore ask an order that these petitions, to wit, letters and telegrams heretofore received and those hereafter to be received respecting that subject may be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as the Committee on the Judiciary has no jurisdiction in the premises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, which I shall not do, but merely as a matter of seeking information, I inquire of the Senator from Arizona if those petitions, resolutions, letters, and telegrams pertain to the question of the right of anyone to hold a seat in this Chamber because of any question as to elections, or do they relate to charges against any Senator with reference to conduct of which he may or may not be guilty as a Senator? As I understand it, the Committee on Privileges and Elections has jurisdiction to pass upon questions involving the election of Senators, but any charges affecting the conduct of one as a Senator without regard to his election should properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is that correct?

Mr. ASHURST. I am of opinion that charges even so serious as to be a reflection upon the character of a Senator should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not desire to recount the nature of these petitions because it is not fair to do so now; some are respectful in form and nature and some not quite so respectful in form and nature. After a consultation with many members, if not with all members of the Committee on the Judiciary, I am of opinion that the petitions relating to the seat of the senior Senator from Louisiana should be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Let it be remembered that the Senate in the last session directed the Committee on the Judiciary to make investigation of a certain legal question involving a matter of privilege and also indirectly relating to the senior Senator from Louisiana. A subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary was appointed, composed of seven members, to examine that question of law. The chairman of the subcommittee is the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary is not asking to be relieved of its duty in that respect. Indeed no subcommittee has worked more diligently or with more assiduity than that subcommittee. I ask that the papers relating to the right of the senior Senator from Louisiana to a seat in this body be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would that take away from the Committee on the Judiciary all matters pertaining and relating to the senior Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ASHURST. It would except the one question upon which the Senate instructed the committee to make report upon a question of law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am not going to make any objection to it, but I do desire to make the statement that an examination of similar cases shows that they have been disposed of in three ways. They have many times been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. They have many times been sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. At other times special committees have been appointed to consider them. I do not know the particular reason why these matters should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but as I happen to be a member of both committees I cannot help myself by objecting, so I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order requested by the Senator from Arizona will be entered.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. ASHURST] called attention to the fact that since the adjournment last spring a number of communications, consisting of petitions, letters, and telegrams, had been transmitted from citizens of Louisiana to the Senate of the United States. Since the Senate convened on January 3 other communications of like character have come to the Senate and all of the communications mentioned were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In my opinion, they should have been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the action of the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in requesting that the reference be changed and that these communications be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was eminently proper.

May I add that the chairman of the committee has been desirous of having all questions relating to the Louisiana situation, which were referred to in the communications, disposed of in an expeditious manner. One matter which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session of Congress is still before that committee, but I know that the chairman of the committee has employed what authority he has to have that matter definitely disposed of. There were some who believed that the matter properly belonged to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but in view of the fact that some legal questions were involved relating to the duty of the Vice President to receive communications, and also involving the question of privileged communications, the Senate decided that the Committee on the Judiciary should consider the same.

A subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was named. As chairman of the subcommittee, I prepared a report, and the subcommittee, after some consideration, decided that the questions involved should be discussed by the full committee.

After some discussion by the full committee the report was referred back to the subcommittee.

A few days ago I sought to have a meeting of the subcommittee in order to further consider the report. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], who is a member of the Judiciary Committee, but not a member of the subcommittee, made the request, that as he expected to be absent from the city for a few days, that no action be taken until his return. As soon as the Senator returns to Washington I shall endeavor to have the subcommittee meet and take such steps in the matter as are deemed proper.

I am sure the subcommittee, as well as all the members of the Judiciary Committee, are desirous of having this matter, which is before them, disposed of at an early date. That this will be done, I have no doubt.

REPEAL OF FEDERAL PROHIBITION LAWS IN PUERTO RICO—AMENDMENT

Mr. TYDINGS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the title of the bill (S. 2107) to repeal Federal liquor prohibition laws to the extent they are in force in Puerto Rico, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEANING OF SOVIET RECOGNITION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio address delivered by Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, S.J., Ph.D., vice president of Georgetown University, under the auspices of the American Alliance of the United States, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, on December 9, 1933, on the subject What Recognition of Soviet Russia Means.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT RECOGNITION OF SOVIET RUSSIA MEANS

For 10 years I have steadfastly opposed recognition of Soviet Russia on the grounds of public policy and because nonrecognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was clearly in accord with the traditional policy of the United States in respect to new governments and newly formed States. Recognition is an act of national political expediency. It is granted when judged in the best interests of the recognizing party and withheld when diplomatic relations would seem harmful, prejudicial, or inopportune. There is no juridical right to recognition, and there is no legal or moral obligation to recognize. Recognition does not imply approval of any particular form of government any more than the daily intercourse of business life involves approbation of the personal conduct or domestic relations of the merchant from whom we buy commodities. Neither, on the other hand, does nonrecognition necessarily imply censure of an existing form of government. Still less does it constitute interference in the internal affairs of the nonrecognized part, any more than my refusal to invite a specific person to my dinner table constitutes an affront to his social reputation or imposes an unwarranted restriction on his freedom of action.

To be sure, recognition of a succession government in modern times normally followed a successful revolution as a matter of customary international procedure, provided no obstacle to mutual friendship existed. While not implying either the censure or approbation, which I have already excluded, recognition does, however, presuppose mutual respect and a decent regard for those international amenities and obligations without which diplomatic relations would be a sham, a lie, and at best but an armed armistice or a nervous neutrality. In the present case there existed for many years just such an obstacle, deliberately created by Moscow, which constituted the main hindrance to recognition of the Soviet Union.

American policy and practice have been governed by two simple considerations clearly set forth by that eminent jurist, John Basset Moore, in his monumental International Law Digest:

"1. That the government seeking recognition shall be in de facto possession and control of the territory over which it claims jurisdiction without substantial revolt or opposition on the part of its population. We do not demand legitimacy of succession, nor do we inquire into the validity of the possessor's title.

"2. That the government in question shall be able and willing to perform its international obligations and conform to the usages accepted by the civilized nations of the world. Failure to conform to these obligations is sufficient grounds for refusing recognition."

That the present Soviet Government had long fulfilled the first requirement is not questioned. That it has hitherto evaded that reasonable second requirement by maintaining on its territory the Third International is matter of public record.

During the recent negotiations comprehensive and formal guaranties of an unprecedented character in several fields were made by the Soviet Government prior to recognition. This, in itself, was a significant abandonment of the previous Soviet policy, which uniformly demanded recognition first and detailed discussion and mutual guaranties to follow.

Mr. Litvinoff's Government, in paragraph 4 of his letter on propaganda and noninterference, undertakes specifically "not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group, and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group or any representatives or officials of any organization or group, which has as an aim the overthrow or preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories, or possessions."

There is at present in residence on Soviet territory, housed in a Government building not far from the Kremlin, a well-known organization highly developed with international ramifications and notoriously hostile to this country. It is known as the "Third International." It was created in 1919 when Lenin, then head of the Soviet Government, sent out on Government telegraph wires an appeal to selected radicals and revolutionaries in foreign lands bidding them come to Moscow as guests of the Soviet Government. There, under official sanction and with Soviet support, a new organization was set up to function as a sort of Soviet ministry for that world-wide Communist revolution which was scheduled to follow the Bolshevist triumph in Russia. Its statutes depict the Third International as the unifying agency which consolidates the Communist parties of the different countries into a single world instrumentality for the overthrow of all non-Communist governments, be they friendly or hostile. The organization is semimilitary in character and wholly military in discipline, the Communist Party of each respective country becoming a section in this Communist International and receiving orders which are mandatory and programs of attack from the general headquarters in Moscow. These instructions are very explicit and were best formulated by that extraordinary sixth congress of the Comintern.

The decisions of these congresses are compulsory for all sections in every country, including the United States, and must be executed immediately without deviation. In pursuance of its purposes the Comintern created an appropriate American division, housed in its headquarters at 1 Sapojkovskaia, Moscow (telephone 28-50 to 28-54), devoted to the preparation of ways and means for the overthrow by force of those fundamental liberties and institutions which are guaranteed to American citizens by article 4, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government * * *."

Stenographic reports of its deliberations are available, and its specific program with regard to the United States is matter of public record. Mr. Stalin has long been a member of the executive committee of the Communist International and on May 6, 1929, he personally delivered definite and voluminous instructions to a so-called "American Commission" with respect to the methods of achieving the changes in our social and political forms mentioned by Mr. Litvinoff. The authentic text of Mr. Stalin's remarks on that occasion are on file in the State Department, Washington. And as late as October 1932 instructions were issued from the same source, directed to American members of the Communist Party, calling for positive acts of aggression against American institutions. Ways and means are pointed out to capitalize unemployment and fan purely local incidents of minor importance into major revolutionary outbreaks.

Again, we are informed by reliable foreign correspondents, on Monday, October 23, 1933, there was published in Moscow, by the printing plant of Krestianskaia Gazeta—a Government organ—and passed by the Soviet censor, a savage attack on President Roosevelt, on the N.R.A., and the American Federation of Labor. Among other things, the diatribe of the Moscow Trade Union International said:

"The Communist Party and revolutionary organizations can and must become the sole leaders of the North American broad masses * * * against Roosevelt's program * * *. It is necessary to dispel the illusions still existing among the workers and to exploit the wave of discontent that is rising, particularly in connection with the practical application of Roosevelt's measures * * *. It is necessary to convert this discontent into a gigantic struggle of the proletariat of the United States * * *. There were some delays on the part of our revolutionary organizations in properly estimating Mr. Roosevelt's program, but now they have formulated their counterprogram and are developing revolutionary activities intensively. Investigation of the masses in open fight and the developing of strikes against the administration's measures are the chief points of this program.

"The struggle of the working class of the United States against Roosevelt's plan, against preparations for an imperialist war, and in defense of the Soviet Union can and must be waged only under the leadership of the Communist Party and by stubbornly following the correct line laid down in these instructions connecting everyday demands with the final goal of the class war and pushing forward the program for a revolutionary issue from the crisis."

The important point here is not what members of the American Communist Party may do in their capacity as citizens of the United States, but that this hostile provocation to violence should have been launched with Soviet approval at the very moment that Mr. Litvinoff was preparing to start for Washington bearing an olive branch and uttering his usual guaranties about international peace.

On November 16, 1933, the Soviet Government, through its Commissar for Foreign Affairs, pledged itself unequivocally to terminate the residence on its territory of any organization or group and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group which aims at the overthrow by force or which prepares the way for such a contemplated overthrow of American institutions. That promise can mean only one thing—the Third International.

This pledge does not concern those secondary problems such as debts—which were postponed by agreement with President Roosevelt for later consideration—but is a primary guaranty immediately operative. The political success or failure of the experiment consequently rests fairly and squarely on the shoulders of the Soviet Government, which is now under solemn covenant, openly and voluntarily arrived at, not only to disassociate itself from but to end the Third International at least insofar as the United States is involved. Delay or further evasion can result in only one logical conclusion—unwillingness to comply. If it pleads inability to control the Third International, it makes virtual confession that there is a political power within its territorial jurisdiction superior to and dominating government—hence the real sovereign. In that case, the Soviet Government does not exercise sovereignty and the United States should withdraw recognition and treat with the indicated ruler, not with a subordinate. That, I take it, would be the international law in the premises.

It cannot be too often or too emphatically repeated that if the Soviet Government persists in clinging to the Third International, it will nullify the gesture toward international peace and normal relations initiated by President Roosevelt and will render abortive, futile, and ridiculous the recent exchange of correspondence. There can be no return to normal relations anywhere so long as one of the parties to the contract retains, fosters, and protects on its territory a hostile and intransigent organization which is bound by its constitution and its statutes to do the very things so clearly outlawed by Mr. Litvinoff in the fourth point of his first pledge. It is not that I fear eventual disintegration of our institutions as a result of the bombastic manifestoes periodically broadcast from Moscow. Should such a disaster overtake us, it will arise from internal corruption, venality in high places, the lust for gold, and from social injustice, not from external aggression. What I do fear is the loss of our self-respect should we surrender to a new impertinence of interpretation, condone another international hypocrisy, and barter the President's signature for a bill of exchange on Moscow. I know that Mr. Litvinoff, in reply to some newspaper correspondents, asserted while here that there is no mention of the Third International in his pledge to President Roosevelt. "You must not read into it more than was intended", he said. There is no need. The specifications are clear, comprehensive, and exact. If the Third International is not included, words have lost their meaning. If Mr. Litvinoff protests that the United States must not read into the document more than was intended, the American public has every right to expect that the President of the United States will not permit Mr. Litvinoff to read out of the documents the very thing that was intended.

SAN PEDRO RIVER, ARIZ., FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in the Seventy-second Congress the Senate directed a subcommittee of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation to make investigation of the water resources of the San Pedro River in Arizona. I present a report from the subcommittee which was directed to make that investigation, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLOOD CONTROL OF SAN PEDRO RIVER, ARIZ.

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following report (pursuant to S.Res. 292, 72d Cong.):

TO THE COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION,
United States Senate:

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 292, Seventy-second Congress, second session, agreed to by the Senate on February 11, 1933, directing the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to make a complete investigation respecting the ultimate utilization of the water resources of the San Pedro River in the State of Arizona, including irrigation, reclamation, flood-control, and power development, a subcommittee was on June 7, 1933, appointed to make the investigation, which said subcommittee was composed of the following: HENRY F. ASHURST, of Arizona; CLARENCE C. DILL, of Washington; ROBERT D. CAREY, of Wyoming.

Complying with the requirements of the said resolution, your subcommittee, on October 23 and 24, 1933, accompanied by Engineer George O. Sanford, of the United States Reclamation Bureau, made a personal investigation and hereby report and recommend as follows:

The San Pedro Valley, together with the remainder of Arizona lying south of the Gila River, was ceded to the United States by Mexico by the Gadsden Purchase. The San Pedro River rises near the international boundary line (United States and Mexico) and flows through the San Pedro Valley in a northerly direction into the Gila River near Winkelman, Ariz. The San Pedro River has many affluents from the Mule, Huachuca, Whetstone, and other mountains in southeastern Arizona, and it furnishes water for irrigation at several settlements along its course. Rural social life is developed to a high degree at these settlements in this San Pedro Valley.

Schools and churches are numerous throughout this valley, telephones are in general use, electricity for lighting and for power is obtainable, and markets are available for the agricultural products of the valley. The climate of this region may be classed as arid. The rainfall, in the mountains and on the desert slopes adjacent to the San Pedro River, although variable, has a mean annual average of nearly 14 inches. The rainfall for the wettest year on record at the Weather Bureau station at Benson was 22.58 inches in 1905. The summers in this region are hot, though not oppressive.

The water supply of the San Pedro River during the past 23 years of records published by the Geological Survey has ranged from a minimum of approximately 20,000 acre-feet per year to a maximum of 122,000 acre-feet per year. The average annual discharge is approximately 60,000 acre-feet.

The proposition of a flood-control project would call for the construction of a dam built to a height of about 119 feet above stream bed, which would provide a storage reservoir with a capacity of about 85,000 acre-feet. Such a reservoir would serve as an effective means of flood control on the San Pedro River, which the records show have occurred with maximum discharges as follows:

	Cubic feet per second
1914	18,000
1917	6,000
1919	25,000
1921	19,000
1923	4,850
1925	11,900
1926	98,000
1929	10,400
1930	9,700
1932	7,000

This flood-control dam and reservoir has been included in and recommended for construction in a report submitted under date of May 18, 1933, by the executive committee of the Arizona section of the American Society of Civil Engineers, an excerpt from which said report is as follows:

"CHARLESTON DAM SITE ON SAN PEDRO RIVER

"A flood of unprecedented proportions, which reached a peak of 98,000 second-feet, swept down the San Pedro Valley during September 1926. This flood is indicative of what is to be expected from other similar watersheds in the State. Damages from this flood ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, to farm lands, highways, and railroads. Nothing has been done on the San Pedro watershed since 1926, in the way of limiting grazing or soil-erosion work, to reduce the intensity of flood discharges. Future floods of equal or even greater proportions are to be expected.

"Complete information on the damages incurred during the 1926 disaster is not available, due to the fact that losses sustained by the Southern Pacific Railroad and individual farmers throughout the valley could not be secured in the short time allotted to the committee for the preparation of this report. The highway departments of the State, and of Pinal and Cochise Counties, spent a total of $176,700 in reconstruction of structures destroyed by the flood. There is no doubt that the Southern Pacific Co. spent several times as much money in repairing flood damages to their lines. Farmers along the river not only suffered crop losses but, in addition, many acres of rich agricultural lands were washed away.

"It is clearly evident from the incomplete survey of past flood damages that a large expenditure is justified for the prevention of future floods. There must be control over flood discharges to prevent the loss of valuable farm lands along the river. In addition, a great reduction in the cost of operation of the San Carlos project would result. Large quantities of silt are carried by the San Pedro during flood periods, and as a part of this water is diverted at the Ashurst-Hayden Dam, the silt is carried into the canal system. Full relief to the irrigation district would not be afforded by a dam at the proposed Charleston site, but there would be partial relief.

"Studies of stream discharge on the San Pedro River show that the 1926 flood of 98,000 second-feet could have been reduced to 5,000 second-feet by a storage reservoir of 85,000 acre-feet capacity. Since the 1926 flood is the greatest on record, it is evident that the proposed storage reservoir of 110,000 acre-feet would do much to prevent future flood damage.

"The Charleston site is situated 6 miles upstream from Fairbank."

The flood-control dam proposed at the Charleston Dam site is a multiple-arch concrete dam, and the preliminary plans submitted have been reviewed by the chief engineer of the Bureau of Reclamation, who has prepared an estimate of cost of approximately $1,200,000.

In addition to the construction of the dam, it will be necessary to remove 11 miles of the Southern Pacific Railroad track which passes through the reservoir site and the gorge where the dam would be constructed.

Estimates of the cost of relocating this railroad have been prepared, and the estimate submitted by the railroad company several years ago shows a cost for this work amounting to $1,150,000, making a total estimated cost of $2,350,000 for a flood-control reservoir.

Such reservoir would provide the necessary flood control on the San Pedro River and would effectively eliminate the possibility of serious damage occurring to homes, farm lands, railroads, bridges, and highways which have heretofore been experienced when such floods occurred. Whenever the reservoir might be filled from a flood discharge, the stored waters could be safely drawn off at such rate as to eliminate the possibility of damage, so that the reservoir would be ready to hold any subsequent flood.

The San Pedro Valley has a population of about 4,730 persons; the valley is relatively oblong and includes about 90 square miles below the proposed flood-control dam, while the watershed above the dam site has an area of about 1,200 square miles.

The benefits to accrue from this expenditure of $2,350,000 are commensurate to the amount of money proposed to be expended. The vital and durable benefit derived from the construction of this flood-control dam would, of course, be the ultimate protection of the homes, farms, villages, highways, bridges, and railroads in the San Pedro Valley from destruction by flood waters, an obligation resting upon the Federal Government; another benefit, equally vital and important, would come from furnishing immediate employment to the large number of citizens of the county (Cochise) who have been out of work for a long time and who have in many cases been sustained by direct contributions from local State and county authorities. The financial condition of the settlers and landowners residing in the San Pedro Valley and in the vicinity of the river's course is such that they could not make any repayments whatsoever of Federal funds expended for irrigation or for flood control.

Some of the materials and equipment to construct the flood-control dam and to relocate the railroad would come from outside points, but all labor for construction of this flood-control dam and relocation of the railroad track could be provided locally, and the construction of the dam and relocation of the railroad track would provide 18,800 man-months of work.

We, your subcommittee, have the honor respectfully to recommend the construction of the flood-control dam at the Charleston Dam site on the San Pedro River.

HENRY F. ASHURST.

AMERICAN HOLDERS OF GERMAN OBLIGATIONS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, many American investors, individuals, and institutions are interested in German obligations of the long-term and short-term varieties. There has been a study made of the subject by the American Council of Foreign-Bond Holders. I have a letter from Dr. Winkler, president of the council, transmitting a report on that subject. I ask to have the letter and the report inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF FOREIGN-BOND HOLDERS, INC.,
New York City, January 5, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
The United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: In view of the interest on the part of American investors, institutions as well as individuals, in German obligations of the long-term and so-called "short-term" varieties, outstanding at approximately $1,600,000,000, I feel that the enclosed study on the German situation, published by the American Council of Foreign-Bond Holders, should prove of interest.

Since you have followed developments abroad as they relate to the status of America's foreign investments more closely than any other American statesman, I felt that you might consider the enclosed report of sufficient interest to warrant its incorporation into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. You were good enough to move that similar reports prepared by the American Council be embodied in the RECORD.

With kind personal regards and best wishes for a happy New Year, I am,

Cordially yours,

MAX WINKLER, President.

DR. SCHACHT PLEADS POVERTY

The amount of German dollar bonds in default has reached the impressive total of $916,509,100. Although a German law passed under date of June 9, 1933, providing for the suspension of payment in foreign currency but for the deposit of marks to the credit of bondholders, such deposits to be transferred in cash as to 50 percent, was to become effective as from July 1, 1933, American holders have received nothing to date. Moreover, if some, or even a majority, were to accept the German plan of payment, the fact remains that it constitutes a distinct violation of original loan agreements, so that one is fully justified in looking upon German dollar bonds as being in complete default at present, and in partial default as soon as the above plan will be in operation.

Dr. Schacht and his cohorts have been laying the blame for the delay in the disbursement of the 50-percent cash payment, to the slowness with which matters have been handled by Washington. Dr. Schacht may not be aware of what America is fully conscious, namely, that the scrip which is to be issued to holders of German bonds will be purchased by Germany at half their face value, on condition that the transaction will increase Germany's foreign commerce. In other words, foreign importers of German merchandise will be able to purchase 100 marks' worth of German goods for only 50 marks, and, since the inherent position of the reichsmark is such as to induce foreign owners to part with the currency at so marked a discount in relation to the officially quoted price, the supply of marks may be expected to be quite plentiful. In this way German shippers are being placed at an unfair advantage over merchants in other countries. It is for these reasons that the authorization to distribute scrip and cash to bondholders may have been delayed.

German bonds, interest and amortization on which, due in January, are not scheduled to be met according to provisions of original loan agreements, are tabulated hereunder:

	Original amount	Amount outstanding	Interest due	Sinking fund due (estimate)
A. Government and political subdivisions (direct and contingent):
Consolidated Municipal Baden 7's	$4,500,000	$3,691,500	$258,405	$90,000
Bavarian Palatinate 7's	3,800,000	3,134,500	219,415	200,000
Heidelberg 7½'s	1,500,000	1,287,000	96,525	30,000
Central Bank for Agricultural 6's	30,000,000	23,100,000	1,386,000	450,000
Consolidated Hydro-Electric of Upper Wuerttemberg 7's	4,000,000	3,671,000	258,970	66,665
Rhine Rhur Water 6's	10,000,000	8,900,000	534,000	200,000
Saxon Public Works 6's	6,485,000	5,867,000	352,020
Total	60,285,000	49,651,000	3,105,335	1,036,665
B. Banking institutions: German Building and Land Bank 6½'s	5,250,000	4,981,000	323,765	52,500
C. Public Utilities: Westphalia Unit. Electric 6's	20,000,000	19,357,000	1,161,420	240,000
D. Industrial enterprises:
German General Electric 7's	10,000,000	7,700,000	539,000	250,000
Harpen Mining 6's	10,000,000	8,700,000	522,000	250,000
Rheinelbe Union 7's	25,000,000	20,600,000	1,442,000	625,000
Siemens-Halske 7's	5,000,000	2,900,000	203,025	132,000
Stinnes (Hugo) 7's	12,500,000	4,900,000	343,000
Tietz (Leonhard) 7½'s	3,000,000	1,950,000	146,250	75,000
United Steel Works 6½'s	30,000,000	22,500,000	1,462,500	400,000
Total	95,500,000	69,250,000	4,657,775	1,732,000
Grand total	181,035,000	143,239,000	9,248,295	3,061,165
Defaults, July-December	909,715,000	773,569,600	9,707,175	10,297,675
Total defaults	1,090,750,000	916,808,600	18,955,470	13,358,840

The amount representing the interest due in the above table includes both the July and the January coupons. The same applies also to sinking-fund payments.

Those familiar with Dr. Schacht's attitude toward Germany's foreign creditors are not likely to be impressed with his renewed plea of poverty and consequent inability of the Reich to meet contractual commitments. Although conceding that in appraising German trade figures one will have to allow for the purchase of a very large volume of merchandise either with blocked marks at a substantial discount compared with officially quoted figures or through tendering German external loans, the head of the Reichsbank seems to ignore the fact that reduced trade is offset, to a very appreciable extent, by the premium which the reichsmark commands over the dollar and the pound, the two currencies in which the bulk of Germany's engagements are payable.

For the first 11 months of last year the country's excess of exports over imports was officially given as RM 618,000,000, compared with RM 1,030,000,000 for the corresponding period in the preceding year. At prevailing rates of exchange, however, the former figure is equivalent to about $231,750,000, while the export surplus for the first 11 months of 1932, converted at the rate of exchange obtaining during that period, amounted to $245,150,000, a decline of less than 5½ percent, and more than neutralized by the huge reduction which has admittedly been effected in the amount of Germany's foreign indebtedness.

On the basis of statistics furnished by the German Government statistical bureaus to and published by the League of Nations in its Monthly Bulletin of Statistics, the subjoined figures should prove of extreme help to those who may endeavor to comprehend the lament of the Reichsbank president. Taking 1932 statistics as a base—that is, 100—salient indices relative to Germany's present economic and financial status are as follows:

General index of production	116.00
Output of textiles	113.75
Output of machinery	111.72
Output of coal and lignite	104.31
Output of pig iron	134.14
Output of steel	133.82
Output of zinc	115.93
Railway freight traffic	99.93
Net tonnage of vessels entered	110.15
Net tonnage of vessels cleared	105.21
Index of wholesale prices	97.60
Index of retail prices	97.93
Commercial bank deposits	91.25
Savings bank deposits	105.78
Index of stock exchange prices	132.48
Number of unemployed	62.19
Quotation of mark (in dollars)	157.57
Average monthly imports—January–November 1933 [1]	125.78
Average monthly exports, January-November 1933 [2]	153.38

Strength in German dollar bonds, despite continued nonpayment of interest, intimation that the proposed 50 percent cash disbursement would once again be postponed till January 24, and threats by Dr. Schacht that the cash payment for the first half of the current year would be reduced to 30 percent, has been decidedly puzzling, to say the least. It will be recalled that offers have been made to holders of German dollar bonds to convert them into mark obligations bearing a lower rate of interest, conversion to be effected on the basis of approximately prevailing quotations for the mark in terms of dollars. In addition, importers of German merchandise are in a position to tender, under certain conditions, such bonds in payment for German goods, the exporter in Germany accepting these bonds at a very substantial discount, even though at a figure somewhat in excess of prevailing quotations in foreign markets.

While such transactions are bound to result in an increase in German export statistics, the gain so recorded is apparent rather than real, because it does not constitute an influx of new funds into Germany, but represents to a large extent a material reduction in the amount of foreign balances presently tied up in the Reich.

In his latest report regarding the status of German external commitments, Dr. Schacht calls attention to the above. What is, however, difficult to explain is the fact that Dr. Schacht, in his earlier talks, never failed to emphasize the impressive gains which have been registered in the various branches of Germany's economy. Why it was necessary for the head of the Reichsbank to wait until the United States Government officially protested Germany's refusal to meet the service on her contractual commitments is somewhat difficult to explain. American holders of German bonds should not be misled by the sharp gains scored by various issues, notably those outstanding on behalf of corporations. How much farther the rise is likely to continue, the writer is not in a position to state, but it should be borne in mind that as soon as the demand for bonds in payment for German goods shall cease, reaction is likely to occur. Investors in German issues will do well to bear this in mind.

CERTAIN LETTERS WRITTEN BY SENATOR ASHURST

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD copies of certain lettters I have sent to citizens of Arizona, and one to the Attorney General.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 29, 1933.

Mr. G. H. BROWN,
Phoenix, Ariz.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Yours of May 25 received, advising that you desire a position with the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and you request me to recommend you "to the new collector at Phoenix as soon as he is appointed."

It is my duty to tell you that the district attorney, marshal, collector of internal revenue, collector of customs, and register of the local land office, respectively, will be appointed upon the recommendations of the United States Senators from Arizona.

In my judgment, it would be improper for a Federal Senator to make any suggestion as to whom such persons thus recommended by Federal Senators should appoint. The Federal officials who may be appointed upon my recommendation shall be left free to select their own assistants, deputies, accountants, and clerks.

On this point I may be—probably am—censurably delicate, but it is my inflexible rule to which I adhered during the Wilson administrations. Quite naturally, I desire to please as many of my constituents as possible and to offend as few of them as possible, but I believe in the principle of absolute noninterference by Federal Senators in the selection of the subordinates of Federal officials appointed upon my recommendation.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

OCTOBER 16, 1933.

Mr. G. A. ROBERD,
Phoenix, Ariz.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your letter received advising that the chamber of commerce had "denounced" Senator HAYDEN and myself for not securing larger sums of Federal funds for Arizona.

This complaint of the chamber of commerce is not at all unique, for daily, from the mail bags, there are dumped upon my desk demands that "this, that, or the other" industry be nourished by some gift, bounty, or largess out of the Federal Treasury.

I sympathize somewhat with the impatience of the chamber of commerce and say in reply that I have worked harder since March 4 last than I have ever worked before, but I am not complaining, for, when an officeholder complains of overwork, he is simply proving that he has a task too big for him.

I have been for years a critic here and hope I am able, without making a wry face, to take a small dose of that medicine—criticism—of which I have given other fellows sizable doses; in other words, I not only "ladle it out" but can also "take it." Pardon my dropping into slang, but it conveys my thought precisely.

I believe you are correct in your conclusion that a number of candidates—all excellent gentlemen—will try to displace me at the next election, but it is beginning to appear as if I shall be reelected, not by reason of any particular merit that I possess or by any political activity on my part, but by the folly of my opponents.

I will see you at Phoenix on the 26th.

Kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

Hon. HOMER S. CUMMINGS, DECEMBER 11, 1933.
Attorney General, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I have the honor to write you regarding the alleged income-tax evasion supposed to have been practiced by former officials of the city of Phoenix, Ariz., regarding certain alleged bribery or alleged graft charges growing out of the construction of the water-pipe line for the city of Phoenix.

A recent issue of a Los Angeles newspaper which discussed these charges carried with it an implication that I had been indifferent or negligent regarding the investigation of this alleged violation of law, and there was a further implication therein that I had written your Department or had adopted some other means of suggesting to your Department that these cases should be dropped.

Quite naturally, I feel not a little concern over such an unjust and untrue insinuation, for I have never intimated that these cases or any other case should be abandoned, and, quite on the contrary, I wrote your Department on July 21, 1933, in which letter I said (and now repeat) that I assume your Department will vigorously prosecute all violations of the income-tax law or other laws to the end that the guilty shall be promptly and adequately punished. I wrote you again on September 27 last urging prosecution of all guilty persons involved in the above-mentioned violations of law.

With high esteem, respectfully yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

DECEMBER 18, 1933.

Mr. W. H. PETERSEN,
16 South Twentieth Avenue, Phoenix, Ariz.

DEAR FRIEND: Your letter of December 10 received requesting the payment of the adjusted-service (compensation) certificates before their maturity.

During the years when no deficit existed in the Federal finances I supported the adjusted-service (compensation) legislation, and I do not believe I made any mistake in so voting.

The question of cashing the adjusted-service (compensation) certificates before their maturity depends now upon the condition of the Federal Treasury.

If the Treasury may without disaster cash these certificates before they fall due, I should, so far as I am able to perceive at this time, be inclined to vote to cash the certificates now, provided always the Treasury may stand the strain.

If, however, the Treasury may not meet this demand and could not pay the certificates before maturity, I would not vote, and could not be expected to vote, to bring a collapse of our national credit. It is a principle of my personal and political conduct, and the same principle should guide governments, never to hold out a promise where such promise is obviously incapable of fulfillment; in other words, do not make promises unless you are certain you can translate the promises into actuality.

I decline to make promises that cannot be fulfilled.

I refuse to raise up hopes that I know will be dashed to the ground.

I shall indeed give careful consideration to and make a close investigation of the question of the ability of the Treasury to pay these certificates before their maturity.

I realize that the phrase "give careful consideration and make a close examination" is sometimes used as a polite euphemism for postponed negation, but I am not using the phrase in that sense, for I shall examine the subject in the hope of finding that the Treasury's condition may justify my voting to pay the certificates before they are actually due; and if, upon investigation, the facts show that the Treasury cannot stand that strain, I shall not be a party to an insincere gesture of pretending to pay an immature obligation out of an empty Treasury.

Kind regards.

Cordially yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

JANUARY 2, 1934.

Mr. A. L. MOORE,

Route 2, Box 223, Tucson, Ariz.

DEAR FRIEND: Your letter of December 25 received, in which you say, "I ask you to work for and vote for repeal of this Economy Act."

I should be lacking in frankness and deficient in courtesy if I failed to tell you that I shall support President Roosevelt all along the line.

A crisis of terrible proportions, bringing many distressful results, came upon our country and has not lifted its blight from us; hence all citizens must continue to make sacrifices for their country's welfare.

It is often quite true that the only way in which an officeholder may render great service to the Nation, in its day of trouble, is by his willingness to lose his future or at least to lose his present position in political life, if he may thereby aid in bringing national recovery, just as the soldier may for a time give up a part of his civil liberties and may pay with his physical life in order to render service for his country in battle.

Whenever grave danger comes to our Nation, whether from unemployment, famine, fire, flood, war, pestilence, or depression, the officeholder must be willing to take action which might be temporarily unpopular if he may thereby aid in the recovery of his country.

I shall follow the President's leadership, and if he should urge that the present law be amended so as to meet your request, I shall support his efforts in that behalf.

Kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, at the last meeting of the American Bar Association, at Grand Rapids, Mich., August 31, 1933, the Attorney General, Hon. Homer Cummings, delivered a very notable address on Modern Tendencies and the Law. I desire to ask that it be printed as a Senate document and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. President, members of the American Bar Association, ladies, and gentlemen, the somewhat exalted topic I have been asked to consider seems to invite a learned discussion. An adequate treatment of its various aspects and implications would, I fear, lead me into pretty deep water. I have no such venturesome purpose in mind. I say this not only to give you a needed, and, I dare say, welcome reassurance, but also to suggest that what is going forward at Washington is so completely engrossing that but little opportunity is afforded to stand outside events and assess their value.

We Americans are much given to quick generalizations. We have a weakness for headlines. In a certain fashion we realize that we are apt to be misled by them, but that does not seem to shake our faith in them. We generalize our hopes, fears, vices, virtues, plans, and ideals—give them a name, and then think more of the name than of the substance. We talk of economic law, inherent rights, fundamental liberty, equality of opportunity, and social justice until these concepts register more as abstractions than as realities. For this reason we are apt to be bewildered when some movement like the new deal comes along and seeks to treat ideas and principles as living and vital things.

It is interesting to note that already this movement presents, in some of its aspects, a slightly distorted picture, because of the mystic potencies and weaknesses of mere names. Would it assert new Executive powers, it becomes a dictatorship; would it compel needed changes, it becomes a revolution; would it put reliance upon the best intellects it can mobilize, it creates a "brain trust"; would it coordinate administrative functions, we behold a supercabinet; if it seeks to combat crime by attempts to bring the police agencies of the country into closer cooperation, we find that Scotland Yard has been transplanted to America. Many of the current criticisms, as well as the excessive hopes it inspires, spring, I apprehend, very largely from this passion to generalize and to see it in the abstract for that which it is not, instead of in the concrete for that which it is.

Fundamentally, all we can hope to do is to release and direct the vital forces that make for a healthy national life. I do not share the view that these efforts will result in the creation of a new social order, even though I realize there are forces moving to that end. New social orders, like poets, are born; not made.

Pressure of necessity and wide-spread distress have made us acutely conscious of serious social maladjustments and have created a condition in which new ideals and forces, long gestating, have a chance to be born; and, under conscious planning and leadership, they may give us something of a new order. "Great distress", says Burke, "has never hitherto taught, and whilst the world lasts it never will teach, wise lessons to any part of mankind." Such counsels of despair, however, leave me as cold as do counsels of perfection; for I think the world does profit by its mistakes and miseries, if wise leadership shows it how. That, at least, is the faith of the new deal.

Underlying this faith is, of course, something of a definitive philosophy with implications bound to have repercussions in the law. It assumes that we are in one of those historic eras of change in which it is the province of government to lead, to assist, and to direct. Its first obligation naturally was to put its own house in order—to face the exigent needs of economy, efficiency, and solvency; and then to deal affirmatively and vigorously with the conditions which have caused so much heart-breaking misery and distress. Manifestly, the crisis was far too acute to permit of prayerful waiting for the curative forces of patient time.

It is a peculiarity of political, as well as juristic thinking, in its earlier phases always to seem more theoretical than practical. Presently, however, we see it penetrating and vivifying the social consciousness; and when time, circumstance, and the leader meet, it becomes a revitalizing force, a new movement, a new deal, and, sometimes, a new order. Witness the effect of academic thinking in shaping the Revolution of 1776, and that of the French; or note its even more striking bearing in the English reform movement of the last century, where such thinking changed the whole pattern of the social and economic order.

The unifying principle which lies at the heart of this modern movement is to be found in the very old concept of cooperation. Indeed, this idea seems so simple that its very simplicity conceals its tremendous strength and scope, as well as the basic part it has always played in the story of mankind. If it appears to be feeble or Utopian, consider for a moment certain patent facts. Note, for instance, the many so-called "socialistic activities" which for many years have been an accepted part of our established order; and observe, also, the steady drift from the competitive to the cooperative ideal. "Rugged individualism", so stimulating in pioneer days or even in a period of economic adolescence, no longer appears to be adapted to a highly relational society that constantly calls for disinterested service and greater solidarity. The competitive ideal, so deeply ingrained in our law does not seem to synchronize with considerations based on economic stability and social unity. Surely it is not visionary, therefore, to regard cooperation, voluntary or even induced, as the way of least resistance, if not the only way out; or as the one and probably only cure for ill-balanced production, for demoralization in competitive industry, and for any threatened collapse of our social order.

It was Bagehot, as I recall, who said that when an Englishman finds himself really thinking, he thinks he is sick, and I suspect that our own sudden compulsions to do stiff planning and hard thinking explain in part the fear that the country is much sicker than it really is.

Manifestly, local government has proved in many ways quite incapable of meeting present emergencies. In the banking crisis, which occurred at the moment of inauguration, it was to the Nation's Chief Executive and to national legislation that the country had to look for relief. The colossal attempt under the National Recovery Act to spread labor and to raise wages and purchasing power, and, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to control crops and to make the farmer's product capable of supporting him, is a Federal effort to which the States and the people are lending willing support. The Department of Justice itself is the subject of demands for the Federal solution of problems hitherto thought the proper subject of local control—racketeering, kidnaping, and the whole problem of crime.

But centralization of power has been looked upon with distrust not only since the days of the Thirteen Colonies, but from time immemorial.

It was an ancient Greek who said that democracy could not survive beyond the reach of the human voice. Clearly, he meant that the acts of the leader must be within the immediate knowledge and subject to the direct approval of the people. The genius of local self-government lies in no mystery; it is in the axiom that if you want a thing that concerns you well done, you must do it yourself. This was the idea of the Greek city-state. This was the idea of the New England town meeting. This was the theory of colonial government in America, and of its revolt against remote control. This was the basis of resistance to the formation of the Union, and it was for lack of central power that government failed under the Articles of Confederation. This was the theory that preserved, in large measure, the sovereign powers of the States. At that point in our history, and for generations thereafter, this theory of government worked exceedingly well. The Thirteen Original States were small in population and isolated. What was done in one, little affected any other. The only democracy within reach of the magistrate's voice was the local democracy. President Washington was never heard at one time by all, or even a substantial part, of the people; nor was Lincoln; nor even Wilson.

But there have been changes. We are no longer a Nation whose problems are local and isolated. A bumper crop 100 years ago was a boon where it grew, or, at the worst, in part a waste. Today it may be a national menace. A shut-down of a grist mill or a smithy in Boston a century since was not felt in Rhode Island, much less in Pennsylvania.

Today almost every economic and social problem is both local and national. Manufacturing, merchandising, transportation, agriculture, mining, oil production, problems of employment and unemployment, of strikes and the settlement thereof, are upon a national scale, or, if local in scope, are national in effect. Child labor in one State may destroy an industry in another. Crime is organized on a Nation-wide basis. Neither the vigilance committee of the old West nor the metropolitan police force of today can cope with this problem without national aid.

Goods and people move as quickly now from San Francisco to New York as they once moved from Philadelphia to the National Capital. From Chicago to Washington is no more distant in time today than from Concord to Boston by foot or horse 100 years ago.

The radio, the airplane, the sound picture have drawn us very close together. Three times within the past 5 months has the voice of the Chief Executive of this Nation reached, in intimate fashion, 50,000,000 eager citizen listeners in an instant of time. The President's far-flung appeal to the American people to cooperate with the National Recovery Administration was heard by the Nation in a single half-hour, and long before the hour was out the response began. Washington today is thronged with citizens coming, within a few hours, from the four corners of our country to apply for codes affecting their several industries; and the mails are surcharged with voluntary agreements sent to the President by employers of labor throughout the land. Who is there so dull as not to catch a hint of drama in these significant events?

The theory of our Government has not changed; but the times have changed and invention has altered the scope and tempo of our life. I think it is hardly to be doubted that the average citizen of today senses his participation in government more acutely and more personally than he has for a generation. In very truth a Roosevelt and a radio have made a town meeting of America.

It is but natural that some of the legal aspects and implications of what is now going forward should disturb the more static members of the bar. I have had occasion to discuss these problems with many of my learned brethren who, while suppressing any public expression of doubt, are manifestly doing so with difficulty.

Later on, all in good time, I suppose these matters will be argued out before our courts and disposed of in orderly fashion. That hour I look forward to with a knowledge of its certainty and with considerable tranquility of spirit.

Unusual and difficult questions undoubtedly confront us. The field of administrative law, already clouded by much uncertainty, is being widely extended. The functions and limitations of the various departments and agencies of government have been taking on new aspects, and the attainment of administrative unity in this vast complex of powers presents a fascinating problem.

Nevertheless, there is no occasion to indulge artificial fears as to the ultimate outcome. There has not been the slightest fundamental departure from the form or nature of our Government or the established order. Our jural system remains intact. The Federal equilibrium has not been disturbed. The life, letter, and integrity of the Constitution have not been impaired. Its checks and balances, its definition and division of authority, and its complete supremacy remain inviolate. The law of the land is still the law of the land.

Every new power intrusted to the President has been conferred by the people, acting through their duly elected representatives and must be and will be exercised within the letter and the spirit of the organic law. Emergency legislation is recognized as such by the Government and will end when the emergency ends. The Congress has neither abdicated nor shirked its right or its duties; it has functioned patriotically and efficiently to meet a national crisis. What is really happening is not an alteration in the established form or texture of government, but a change in the spirit and application of government.

Manifestly, emergency conditions do not justify emergency theories of the law. It is not the duty of the Attorney General, for instance, to attempt to make new law, but to construe and uphold the law and the Constitution as applied and interpreted by the courts. Equally it is his duty to help give practical effect to the ends sought by the recent legislation and the policies of the administration. In this effort, I shall hope to be guided by a sense of economic realism, rather than by any narrow legalism; to be helpful and constructive, rather than hypertechnical or reactionary; and to make the application and interpretation of these laws fit not only into our established jurisprudence, but into the new patterns of economic planning and broad statesmanship which these disturbed times demand.

If it were true, as some persons affect to believe, that the Congress by its recent legislation has created a dictatorship, my duties as law officer, sworn to uphold the Constitution, would be arduous indeed. But we have done nothing of the kind. The long story of dictatorships from those of the early Roman Republic to the present time, offers no single historical parallel. With us there has been no usurpation of power; no substitution of the Executive will for the national will; no resort to force or fear; no repression of dissenting thought or criticism; no pretensions to omniscience or omnipotence. New laws and new powers! yes; but they march with the sense of justice and the needs of our common country. They rest on established and traditional sanctions. This philosophy of "Government in action" is based upon traditions and ideals fundamental in Americanism; leadership, justice, moderation, cooperation, unity, confidence, faith, enthusiasm. These concepts are as old as America, as old as the basic idea of democracy, and by them we shall find our way back.

The constitutional difficulties inherent in the recent legislation, I think, are grossly magnified. Our fundamental law is faced with no unusual stress or strain. During the World War we put it to a far more radical test in emergency laws, like those relating to selective service, espionage, the War Industries Board, the Food Administration, the control of railroads, industrial mobilization, and the like. Now, as then, we face a war—a war to win back prosperity. Then, as now, the Constitution met the test and marched with the need of the times. Conditions and public opinion change from one era to another; and so does judicial interpretation. As President Wilson once said: "The Constitution is no mere lawyer's document, but the whole of the Nation's life." Each crisis, each era produces its own peculiar legal problems, and our judicial tribunals have never failed to solve them with constructive intelligence. In dealing with given cases I am confident that the courts, in the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, will consider them "in the light of our whole experience, and not merely by what was said a hundred years ago." It is this very flexibility which has permitted the Constitution to withstand strain and to endure. What is going forward is not, therefore, a violation, but rather a vindication of our form of constitutional government.

To my mind, the law is not a mere body of precedents. I visualize it as a living, vital, growing thing, fashioned for service and constantly being refashioned for further service. Its function is to serve. It changes and it grows. It is not, and it should not be, the unloved ruler of a reluctant people. It is, and it should be, a trusted servant ministering to the needs of mankind. It should serve to cement, and not to strain, the bonds of affection that exist between the people and the government they have erected.

Carlyle thought that democracy was bound to fail, because, he said, you could not have "government by discussion." Some of our citizens, who have more or less covertly sympathized with the idea of Carlyle, have become so discouraged that they have frankly despaired of our civilization and maintain that it is not merely upon trial, but that it has failed.

Others, pointing to the swift and even fundamental changes that have overtaken other peoples in other parts of the world, have freely predicted the break-up of the foundations of our Government. These fears I do not for a moment share. Nor do I believe that they are entertained by any substantial portion of our people. As I look about, I see no swift and disturbing governmental changes amongst peoples long habituated to self-rule under democratic forms. A well-established democracy is the most stable of governments. Its very structure admits of necessary adjustments in times of stress. As for ourselves, the heritage of liberalism stands us in good stead. Those who founded our Government, and gave their lives for it, have not been forgotten. America is made of stout stuff, and our democracy runs too far back into the history of the struggle for liberty to succumb merely because our governmental machinery is out of adjustment.

For years our people have been upon a long, bitter trek, with its wastage of life and treasure—a downward, disheartened, bewildered retreat toward lower levels of civilization and to the very verge of economic and financial disaster. What man of vision, or understanding, or human sympathy, could have witnessed this prolonged retrogression without profound sorrow and acute apprehension? The frantic and, for the most part, futile attempt to adjust debts, in the face of constantly falling price levels, has taken its toll upon every hand. No one has escaped. Values have disappeared; taxes lie like a dead hand upon enterprise; the savings of years have vanished; industry is prostrated; millions are unemployed; the farming population has been reduced to penury; the nations of the world have retired into the watertight compartments of a narrow nationalism; commerce no longer puts to sea; and, to a disturbing extent, fear and animosity have taken the place of common good will and common sense.

Who is there who does not turn with distaste from this dark picture to welcome the harbingers of a new day! A program of progress is already unfolding before us. It has passed the period of promise and entered the stage of fulfillment. Moreover, it is being developed under a leadership so inspiring that, schooled as I am in the disappointing business of politics, I feel my pulses stir and my heart leap again at the sight of America emerging from her dark dream. This is no time to assess responsibility for our present troubles in terms of narrow partisanship. This is a period of national emergency that engages the faith and service of every man, woman, and child in America. The spiritual resources of the Nation must be mobilized and the hidden reservoirs of abundance drawn upon. The artificial restraints that have dammed back the flow of prosperity must be released once more; that which was unplanned or selfishly guided must take its place in an orderly governmental process, and a great cleansing and rebuilding program must go forward to its conclusion. If I mistake not, the people of America, without respect of partisanship or previous party affiliation, welcome this wholesome process with glad hearts.

If, however, these emergency laws and constructive acts are to succeed, or are to accomplish lasting good, it will not be because of their coercive powers or their perfections of plan and detail, or the aggressive enforcement efforts of agents and officials, but rather because they correctly interpret, as I believe they do, the thought and spirit, the tone and rhythm of today.

Never was there such a need or such a chance for the profession of the law to do creative and constructive work and rise to its old power and prestige. One of the most heartening features of our trying work in Washington is the generous and helpful spirit thus far shown by the members of the bar. It has been particularly so in the work on the difficult business codes, where there is so much opportunity for the merely clever lawyer to show his skill; and for the great lawyer to show his constructive capacity.

The legal mind, I suppose, is instinctively individualistic, and client relations probably accentuate the stress laid upon private as opposed to public interests. If it is difficult for business to adjust itself to emergency regulations of wages, hours, and trade practices, I dare say it is even more difficult for the practicing lawyer to do so. It is neither unnatural nor improper to respect the past and to be influenced by precedent, but in this dynamic hour of change it is the new, the untried, you are called upon to interpret and support, and I have an abiding faith that you will do this with that fidelity and sincerity and that larger vision and sense of horizons which have always characterized our profession at its best—and that you will do it, too, in that spirit of constructive cooperation for which the necessities of our people so eloquently plead.

POLICIES OF THE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] last evening on the subject of the Polices of the Administration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

My friends, it is time for public men who love their country to speak plainly. This I shall try to do tonight. There are certain selfish and misguided people in this country who are seeking to rock the boat of national recovery. They should not do so. It is no time for the display of selfishness or greed. In this hour of distress and trouble all good Americans should stand by their country and their country's leader.

Wall Street, the collective name for the high financial forces of New York City, has opened a battle upon the program and policies of President Roosevelt.

The issue is sharply and clearly defined. The sole question is whether the country will support the practices which wrecked our country from 1929 until 1933 or get solidly behind President Roosevelt in an effort to save our country and restore the general prosperity of all the people.

This is the one great question before the American people today.

It is the death struggle between lawful and unlawful business.

It is a death struggle between the speculators in New York City, who produce nothing and who create nothing, and the great wealth-creating masses of our people.

Fortunately the entire Nation has been permitted to peek behind the scenes and to see Wall Street at work. The Senate Banking Committee has certainly performed a wonderful service. I stop here long enough to take off my hat to that noble and splendid and courageous Chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, for his signal service to his country in ferreting out and exposing the nefarious methods of these so-called "financial kings." That committee has revealed the inner methods used by our discredited financial magnates. It has shown how financial balloons are inflated and how million-dollar bubbles—yes, billion-dollar bubbles—are blown up, shoot their iridescent hues for a few moments in the financial air, and then collapse.

It has shown how great financial houses in New York have allowed themselves, for the sake of huge commissions, to float the worthless bonds of foreign countries among our own people, fleecing and robbing them for the benefit of foreign customers and a few insiders here. It is impossible to believe that any intelligent man among them did not know that these bonds were comparatively worthless when they were sold. In some cases, by reason of the financial prestige of the sellers, they forced sales to institutions which did not want them and which subsequently suffered tremendous losses by reason of such purchases.

Their system is a system of creating fictitious prices for so-called "securities", which prices grotesquely called "values", are made by pretending sales in which the left hand of the stock broker sells to its own right hand that which does not, and never did, exist, and then turns and rebuys the same fairytale "securities", so that the public is given the idea that an actual value exists in the paper sale. The public is then asked to buy, and does buy, the will-o'-the-wisp stock, creating paper fortunes for the men who juggled the stocks and worked the deal.

Get-rich-quick Wallingford, of fiction fame, was a piker beside the get-rich-quick schemes of Morgan and his layout, Kuhn-Loeb & Co. and their lay-out, and the Mitchells, the Wigginses, and their ilk.

Not one cent of real money of any kind, to say nothing of a single gold dollar, ever figured in any part of these sleight-of-hand, fraudulent sales manipulations.

The same forces and practices of the high command extend to the industrial concerns engaged in producing goods and employing men and women. The controlling figures looked only to the sale of stocks and bonds issued upon any given plant, basing the issues not upon the physical value of the plant or its invested capital or its earning capacity in average normal periods, and taking the lean with the fat, but solely upon what stock manipulation, assisted by ringing the market, could make the issues appear to be worth to a gullible public.

Again, bear in mind that no money of any kind—gold, silver, or paper money—figured in any of these inside transactions.

The principal use of gold in normal times has been to employ it in shipments to foreign countries when the balance of trade has been against the United States. Gold is never used in a free-market condition except to exchange differences when and where the differences in the rate of exchange are greater than the cost of shipping gold and insuring it in transit.

The vast majority of instances in which gold has been used within the last 18 years have arisen from transactions in which American money has been loaned to foreign nations and to foreign business men.

While the Nation, through its Wall Street agencies, has been gambling on the prospect of maintenance of business in Europe, the extending of bank credits to little and large business men at home has been curtailed and oftentimes denied entirely.

Because of this employment of American gold and credit abroad, credit has been shut off to the business man at home.

The American business man was not, therefore, able to pay his employees.

Men and women were thus compelled to join the army of the unemployed.

Eleven millions of idle people walked American streets looking for work.

Bread lines were formed in almost every town in the United States. Thousands of banks were failing all over the country. Trade and commerce were at a standstill.

Weak banks failed outright. Good banks were afraid to function.

Therefore, bank credits, the very lifeblood of a prosperous Nation, dried up, leaving a desolate economic waste in their wake. All of this was grist to the financial district of New York.

Then along came Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

He turned his eyes toward the bread lines, and it was his conviction that no country could be prosperous with the great masses of the people unemployed and hungry, with no buying power.

He knew that a little handful of financial people, commonly known as Wall Street, got the money we had loaned to Europe for the sake of commissions and largely from those very people who were now unemployed and in the bread line.

He knew that Wall Street itself could not long keep itself out of the bread line unless it helped to take the masses of the people from the bread line, for those in financial New York neither toil nor spin, produce nor create. It was clear that the goose which laid the golden egg was dying from starvation.

That was the condition which faced the President on March 4 last.

He found the doors of the Nation's banks all closed and bank credits had almost completely disappeared.

Red tape, legal technicality, boresome precedent, factories closed down, business failed and failing, commerce gone, men hungry and in bread lines, men walking the streets for want of work, faced our new President before he took the oath of office.

He cut the red tape and put the lifeblood of the Nation, credit, into motion. They cheered him in Wall Street while their own chestnuts were being pulled from the fire. When he helped to take care of their insurance companies, their banks, their mortgage companies, they applauded him to the echo.

And, now, with their own fingers unscorched, they turn on him as he labors to relieve the rest of the Nation. "Give us back the good old get-rich-quick days", they demand. "Let us go back to unbridled speculation and dishonest practices", they say.

Voicing this plea, we find the leading British financiers objecting to our reducing the value of the dollar abroad, when it is less than a year that the British Government did exactly the same thing with the English pound. And yet they would fain make us now believe that they do not know what the President's plan of buying gold is.

Echoing this criticism from London, comes France, whose franc went to less than the American nickel, to 25 percent of its pre-war value, and which now holds the whip hand in European finances through the restoration of gold, and the repudiation of debts, while she owes the United States and will not pay!

The public gets from every known representative of the New York financial district the same deep voice, commanding "Stop Roosevelt." Stop him from what? Stop him from saving the legitimate business of the United States? Stop him from giving jobs to the jobless? Stop him from giving bread to the hungry? Stop him from restoring bank credits to the business men of the Nation? Stop him from his gold purchase policy of cheapening our dollar abroad and thereby enormously increasing the sale of our surplus products abroad? Stop him from helping the farmers? Stop him from helping those who labor and who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow? Why should any honest man want to stop him from seeking to do these necessary things? Stop him from bringing back prosperity to our desolate land, desolated by the speculators and by the dishonesty and corruption of these very people?

Before the Chicago convention and at the Chicago convention we heard that cry—"Stop Roosevelt." They did not stop him then, and they cannot stop him now. The self-seeking politicians could not stop him then, and the financial people who control these politicians cannot stop him now.

Financial Wall Street cannot stop him. Their puppets cannot stop him. He has set his hand to the plow to redeem our country from the ruin brought on it by that same financial crowd, and he will not turn back.

Wall Street is not going to stop him. It is going to be forced to drop its selfish and short-sighted policies, the policies that brought wrack and ruin and misery to the people of this Nation 3 years ago. It is going to be forced to abandon its attacks on the President to save itself from financial suicide and at the same time force them to share in the returning prosperity of the American people under the wise policies of Mr. Roosevelt.

And the New York financial gang, who should pay an income tax, but don't; who make these fortunes by rigging the markets; who deceive honest people by selling them worthless foreign and domestic stocks and bonds; who, by fraudulent practices, rob the people—they know they are going to be shorn of their power under this honest President, and hence their tears, hence their denunciation of him and their pretended lack of confidence in him.

They talk about Roosevelt destroying confidence! God save the mark! These very people 4 years ago destroyed all financial confidence, and now they are trying to put the blame on Roosevelt. Surely the people will not be misled by this shameless attempt to rig the market of confidence in their own selfish and ruinous policies. Americans, choose ye today whom we shall serve—the financial buccaneers of New York, the Morgans, the Kuhns, the Wigginses, and the Mitchells, who in their own selfish greed brought ruin and desolation upon you 3 years ago, or Roosevelt, the courageous champion of the right of all the people to share in the Nation's wealth and to enjoy a greater prosperity.

For me and my house and my people, I choose Roosevelt.

My friends, be not deceived. President Roosevelt has furnished us with a truly great leadership in this time of distress. He is the only one who has given us a plan of recovery. Not one of his critics has even suggested a plan. They have no plan. It is the Roosevelt plan or chaos.

WORLD CONDITIONS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on last Monday night the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in New York City delivered a rather remarkable address, in which we are all interested. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, the strong tendency of all revolutions is to break entirely with the past. A new world is to be created. A new start must be made. What men have thought before is not important, perhaps harmful. The efforts they have put forth, the sacrifices they have made, are to be regarded as without value. Traditions and policies which have become interwoven with the moral and intellectual fiber of a people, the habits, customs, and mode of living, the institutions they have reared at great cost of money and blood, are sought to be rejected and forever put aside. Books and symbols are burned or in some way destroyed. This is the revolutionary idea. But, fortunately, it is never realized. Fortunately, the wealth—material, moral, intellectual—gathered through centuries of effort, cannot be destroyed. No revolutionary movement can wholly escape the living past. Tradition, after all, does not yield to revolutionary decrees. Experience will have a hearing. Reflection and the inexorable nexus of things bring men back to take up the broken threads, mend them, if possible, preserve that which is best, separate things which are fugitive from things which are permanent, and then go forward with that patient building which is the true and dependable method of permanent advancement.

Washington, in his immortal Farewell Address, said: "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. * * * Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote, relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. * * * Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interests, humor or caprice?" Thomas Jefferson stated the same principle with greater brevity, declaring: "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

This policy thus announced remained the unchallenged and revered policy of this Nation for one hundred and twenty-odd years. Whatever differences of view may have arisen in most recent years, none were found, and none will be found, I venture to believe, to question the wisdom of this policy at the time it was announced or for more than a century thereafter. Without it, the Republic could not in all probability have withstood the ordeal of those formative years. It was an indispensable part of the scheme of free government. Together with the Declaration of Independence, the treaty of peace, and the Constitution of the United States, this policy made up the title deeds to our liberty and the guaranties of our independence.

There were giants in the land in those days, men of deep insight into government, of profound convictions, for which convictions they were always willing to contend and for which they did contend. But in all their contentions, upon this first great announcement as to our foreign policy there was no division. And down through the fierce years of political warfare in which men fought with the relentless ardor of great souls over almost every conceivable question of statecraft or politics, upon this policy they were united. Behind it and for more than a century was the combined support and loyalty of this masterly group of men, the only body of men in all history who successfully organized, set up, and maintained a real representative Republic.

It was under this policy that we grew in strength and influence, settled our domestic problems, brought prosperity and happiness to our own people, and won and held the respect of all nations. Under this policy we announced the doctrine of neutrality and maintained it. We announced the Monroe Doctrine and saw to it that it was respected. In the midst of civil war we sternly rebuked those who would interfere in our domestic affairs, and our position was tremendously strengthened by the policy of noninterference, which we had always unwaveringly maintained. The influence of this Republic was felt throughout the world, not because of armies or navies but rather through the force of example; we lived up to our creed—peace, commerce, and friendship with all nations. We were not hated, we were not reviled because we did not do more, and, though alone, we were not afraid.

The World War brought about for the first time a wide difference of opinion touching the foreign policy of the United States. Since that time it has been earnestly and ably contended that our foreign policy, so long a part of our national life, was no longer applicable to conditions brought about by that great conflict, and that it should be abandoned once and for all. With this program was to go that part of international law relating to neutrality. We were to assume a position in world affairs the very reverse of that which we had held from the beginning of the Government. We were not only to accept full part and full responsibility in the adjustment of all questions of international import—and they were practically all of that nature—which should arise in Europe or in the Orient, but even in the remotest regions of the earth. We were never to assume the "immoral" position of neutrals. Nationalism and devotion to one's country were to be reduced to a minimum. Internationalism was to be the supreme, dominating force among the peoples of the world. Like other revolutions, it sought to break with all the past, its traditions, its policies, and the views and teachings of its mighty leaders.

In this revolutionary movement were two distinct groups of individuals—working to the same end, but in quite different ways. There were those who sincerely believed that the new course was the high and honorable and most beneficial course to pursue. They entertained the hope, if not the belief, that the Great War had wrought deep and lasting changes in the minds and hearts of the people of the world and that they were now ready to accept a wholly new theory of nationalism. It seemed to be their theory that war had brought all peoples into a more kindly, brotherly relationship—that in this awful baptism of blood peoples had found a new life and were henceforth to be guided by a new spirit. That those views were, and perhaps still are, sincerely entertained by many people no one can doubt.

There was another group of individuals having a large part in this program, not admirable in many respects, willing to surrender our foreign policy, but not quite willing, in the face of what seemed an unsettled public opinion, to say so outright.

Hence, began that shambling, equivocal policy which found expression in a multitude of reservations and all kinds of explanations, none of which nor all of which would have preserved the foreign policy which, like Peter of old, they professed to love but would not own in the hour of crucifixion. Following the period of reservations and the consolations which seemed to flow therefrom there came into international affairs a strange figure known as the "unofficial observer", a kind of international spy, going about over the continents listening in on other peoples' business. I say "other peoples' business" because had it been our business, we should have been there in the person of a duly appointed and authorized agent of the Government, assuming full responsibility with all participants. This practice brought discredit to our Government, impeached before the world our sincerity, and had a tendency at least to degrade the revered policy of Washington to the level of the fugitive discretion or whims of an international interloper. Whatever happens in the future, let's be rid once and for all of this un-American and humiliating policy, if you may call that a policy, which policy has none. Wherever we go or wherever we disclose an interest, let's go as full participants and assume full responsibility. One may personally respect, though he differs with, those who insist that our long-established policy has become obsolete and give their reasons in support thereof, although one may be permitted, I trust, to recall Chancellor Thurlow's remark in reference to the reasons given by his friend, Scott. But this shuffling, uncertain, apologetic attitude toward our American policy and toward the other peoples of the earth and nations of the world can excite nothing less than derision, if not the contempt, of all true Americans and all sincere and candid men everywhere.

The hopes entertained that the war was to give us a new world have in no sense been realized. One of the ablest of those who entertained this hope, noted for his breadth of mind and candor of thought, has recently declared: "During the 1920's I held the conviction firmly that the world was to experience a period of great international cooperation in every field. Looking at the world today, one may still hope but certainly must question the soundness of that vision of the 1920's." No less illuminating are the words of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, spoken a short time ago. He declared that he was "looking upon a stage with something moving immediately behind the footlights—an ominous background full of shadows and uncertainties," and that "confidence between nations was more lacking than ever." There is something moving behind the footlights; it is the inevitable forces of national life which often elude detection until they have begun to write their decrees.

In respect to international matters, the world has not changed, the Orient has not changed, Europe has not changed. The nations were never so heavily armed in peace times as in the fifteenth year after the signing of the armistice. Nearly $5,000,000,000 are annually extorted from impoverished peoples in preparation for another war. National frontiers in many instances are in effect battlefronts. The issues between certain leading powers are as inexplicable and irreconcilable as they were before the conflict began. The old system of the balance of power again dominates the European Continent. Diplomatic moves bend to its delusive assurances. The Corridor, the city of Danzig, Upper Silesia, the problem of the minorities, Manchuria in the Orient, the vindictive judgments of the peace treaties, the inequality of nations, now the cornerstone of international law in Europe, all these problems, truculent, and inexorable, serve to keep Europe armed and vigilant, and to warn us again and again that the reign of internationalism has not yet arrived. They are European problems arising out of conditions centuries old. The outside world cannot reach them. To make an attempt to do so would ignite the powder mine.

The answer to nationalism, it is insisted, is the nearness of all peoples by reason of modern invention and improved methods of transportation. Europe is now at our door, it is claimed, and Asia just around the corner. We cannot, therefore, be indifferent to their problems. We must have a part in all that concerns them; nearness makes their affairs our affairs. This matter of nearness seems to play strange pranks sometimes. It has certainly run counter to the expectations of many in the last 20 years, although we might have been well advised, since it had been doing the same things among the crowded peoples of Europe for a thousand years. Nearness has not begotten there a common interest or a common purpose or even friendly relations. It has not mellowed the individuality of nations or fostered and strengthened the spirit of cooperation. It has not induced the belief that because of nearness there should be less of the national spirit. It has not put an end to war or rendered it less likely to occur.

On my father's farm, with no other dwelling nearer than 2 miles, and in some directions nearer than 20, the doors to our home were never locked. If there was a key on the place, I never saw it. In our great apartments of today, with a multitude of families within easy reach, we have locks which lock themselves, and it is my feeling that even if these families were Japanese, Chinese, Italian, French, or Russian instead of Americans we would still keep the self-locking locks on the doors. Familiarity does not necessarily breed respect and propinquity does not beget confidence. Europe is as far away today—likewise the Orient—in everything which makes for the community spirit, for social understanding, for political accord, as it was when the greatest of political philosophers, the most profound student of Europe this country has ever known, joined with the wisest of political leaders in warning the American people against entangling alliances of any kind.

Mr. President, it is one of the crowning glories of the world that we have different peoples and different nations and different civilizations, different political concepts. Standardization may be all right for cattle and sheep and swine of all kinds, but it is not applicable to peoples or nations and it is not in accordance with the divine economy of things.

Another revolution has failed. It had to fail. It could not escape the living past. It did not weigh sufficiently the inertia of human nature; it underestimated the strength of those ancient prejudices and fears, as well as those ancient faiths and beliefs, the intellectual and moral paths over which men and women had trodden for centuries. The fight against nationalism has lost. It was bound to lose. It was a fight against the strongest and noblest passion outside of those which spring from man's relation to his God, that moves or controls the impulses of the human heart. Without it civilization would wane and utterly decay. Men would sink to the level of savages. Individuality in persons is the product of the most persistent and universal law of nature. It is woven of millions of subtle and tireless forces. No power can change this law or frustrate its operation. This is equally true with nations. Internationalism, if it means anything more than the friendly cooperation between separate, distinct, and wholly independent nations, rests upon a false foundation. And when undertaken, it will fail as in the name of progress and humanity it should fail.

Out yonder in the sad bean fields of Manchuria, empty formula met reality, internationalism encountered nationalism, and the pathetic results are recorded in the great disappointment of many wise men. In an old Greek tragedy you will find this line: "Alas! How dreadful to have wisdom where it profits not the wise."

Nationalism, pride, and love of country is a passion peculiar to no people, indispensable to the welfare of all. To undertake its destruction is madness. To foster it, cultivate it, direct its finer qualities along high and honorable and peaceful lines, as exemplified in the precepts and examples of Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, with countless others whose names will readily come into your thoughts, is the highest mission, the noblest calling, in which men and women associated with public affairs can engage and to which a free people can devote their aims and consecrate their energies.

Its maintenance has cost blood. So has religion. It has entailed suffering beyond the power of words to paint. So have all the creeds and faiths of men. But it is worth all it has cost. Ask the Polish people, taking a single instance from the crowded pages of history. Frederick the Great, in his old age, writing to Voltaire, said: "Now that Poland has been settled with a little ink and pen, the 'Encyclopedie' cannot declaim against mercenary brigands." But Poland had not been settled by a little ink and a pen. Physically dismembered, her national spirit lived on. Homeless, as it were, it appeared upon every battlefield for liberty and fought for the oppressed in every land under the heavens. Without a country of its own, this Polish spirit of nationalism made the land of the downtrodden among all peoples its home. When the World War came, near 200 years had intervened since the crime was committed. But there was no stronger feeling of nationalism anywhere to be found than in this dismembered country. And like a ghost of retribution, it pursued those who had inflicted what was supposed to be a mortal wound to their utter undoing. Shall we hope to achieve for the world what the despoilers sought to do with Poland? Even though we employ oceans of ink and millions of pens, our effort will be just as futile as was theirs. War may spread its ruin, you may wreck the fundamental law and uproot the institutions of your country—these are but the fruits of man's efforts. But a higher power has planted in the human breast devotion to country, and all permanent progress must rest upon that basic fact.

With these intimations as to my views, here I might stop. But the subject assigned to me by your spokesman calls for a more specific word. Our Foreign Policy in a Nationalistic World was the topic assigned to me for this evening.

It is a nationalistic world, intensely so. There can be no doubt about that. Everywhere the national spirit is evoked, fostered, and religiously maintained. Whatever we may think as to some of its policies and tendencies we must admit that under its welding, cementing, driving power different peoples have been lifted into a region of exertion and consecration nothing less than amazing. In countries where there was debility, incompetency, and utter demoralization among the masses there is now strength and vigor and hope. Trampling under foot the false and feeble philosophy which would disparage the healing, uplifting power of patriotism they sacrifice, suffer, and endure, and find their highest compensation in the increasing vigor, prestige, and honor of their country. These conditions and these sentiments are not likely to undergo a change in the near future.

If a foreign policy should be offered to these nationalistic nations which would not fit into, serve, and augment their nationalism, it would be rejected. Such a policy was offered to Japan. It was rejected. Where would a foreign policy based upon internationalism find reception in Europe or in the Orient? Like the dove from the Ark, there would be no place for it to light. When the security committee of the League several years ago sought of Great Britain her views upon the terms of the Covenant the committee was plainly informed that Great Britain would determine for herself whether there was a breach in the Covenant and would determine for herself what, if any, action she would take in regard to it if a breach should occur. Who would expect Great Britain to do anything different? And who would long respect her if she did do anything different? The invasion of the Ruhr, Corfu, the seizure of Manchuria, these things indicate rather strongly that all schemes of international cooperation must fit into national realization. Judging the future by the past, it will always be so. Europe has not changed in this respect; and I venture to say, in the interest of civilization, it is well that she has not changed. Europe, with her developing nationalism, may throw many dark shadows upon the future. But Europe, without the national spirit, would be hopeless beyond redemption. Nationalism does not necessarily of itself mean militarism or war, as shown by our own history. But anything is preferable to suffocation in the fetid atmosphere of national decay. National decay begins where nationalism ends.

I am far more concerned about our domestic problems than I am about our foreign affairs, although our foreign policy will greatly help or hinder the Nation in dealing with our domestic problems. It will be a long time, I venture to believe, before there will be any necessity or justification for the United States engaging in a foreign war. But the questions at home are imminent; they are upon us, not only those which have to do with the depression, but many which are even of a graver and more permanent nature, problems which have their roots deep down in our whole social and political structure. I could not get my consent, and you would not expect a discussion of these at this time. It is sufficient for the purposes of the evening to merely indicate some of them. Our stupendous debt burden, public and private, some $220,000,000,000; our constantly increasing tax burden, city, county, State, and national; the chronic waste of public money; the utilities problem; conservation and proper use of our natural resources; the banking question; the money problem; the more equitable distribution of wealth—these and many more problems push for consideration. No scheme on earth can give us permanent contentment or permanent prosperity until they are solved. Indeed they were contributing causes of the depression.

The guaranty of our national efficiency, prestige, and strength, notwithstanding the many problems with which we must deal, of that political liberty, that freedom from oppression, which is to be found not alone in wise leaders but even more in a united and a wise people—united not only by constitutional forms and one flag but united in spirit and exaltation of purpose. After all, the source of power under our Government is the people. If at that source there is wanting poise and judgment, devotion and wisdom, this will inevitably be reflected in unstable policies and unwise laws; the people "must nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of earth." Our foreign policy, therefore, should be one best calculated to unite our own people morally, spiritually, and economically, to inspire them with a sense of national fidelity and personal responsibility.

This country has within her boundary people from almost every land under the sun, still conscious under certain conditions of the "mystic chords of memory." Every civilization has made its contribution to the American civilization. How easily to transfer the racial antipathies and political views and controversies of the Old World into our very midst. Once abandon our policy of aloofness from European controversies and we bring these controversies into American neighborhoods and into our national life. We are constantly warned how persistently that transfer takes place. Only recently the bitterness, the intensity, of a European controversy nerved the arm and guided the hand which grasped the dagger of the assassin not only in our very midst but under the most sacred and solemn surroundings.

Eschewing policies which tend to keep alive former attachments and the political controversies of the Old World, we should exert to our utmost the healing, cementing power of patriotism and mold 120,000,000 people into an invincible, intellectual, economic, and political force for the enactment and administration of just and equal laws.

In the immediate years, believing that I was laying the foundation for the adjustment of all our problems, believing that I was engaged in not only saving government but in saving souls, not only preserving institutions but preserving human liberty, like Peter the Hermit, with his tongue of fire, I would preach united national aims and ideals, I would instill anew the great truth that democratic institutions are the only hope for the personal worth, the dignity, and individual liberty of the citizen. I would frame all laws and shape all policies with these great ends in view. In no other way can be hope for contentment and power at home or respect and influence abroad.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I believe in the foreign policy which offers peace to all nations, trade and commerce with all nations, honest friendship with all nations, political commitments, express or implied, with none—the policy which not only in fact respects the rights and sovereignties of other states and nations without distinction of great and small, and particularly upon this continent, but which would also refrain from words or acts that would seem to challenge those rights. Under the shelter and the inspiration of such a foreign policy I would foster and strengthen that brand of Americanism which believes in the worth, efficiency, and grandeur of constitutional democracy, in the vigilant preservation of the personal liberty and the individual privileges of the citizen, realizing that our institutions and the whole vast scheme of democratic government depend upon our ability to harmonize the rapacious economic forces of the modern world with the political freedom and economic rights of the individual. Thus, armed with a sense of justice toward other nations on the one hand and a sense of duty toward our own people on the other, this Nation will remain at peace with all nations who want peace, and if there be those who do not, and will not, have peace, we will under such circumstances need have no fear.

Mr. President, there is no creed or faith, no political principle or form of government, but must at some time or other undergo attacks, and this seems to be one of the periods of challenge and general assailment. We read of a movement lately initiated in one of the leading countries of Europe to delete the Ten Commandments, presumably that part which says: "Thou shalt not kill"; edit the Lord's prayer, since that perfect supplication encompasses all men regardless of race or creed; abolish Christianity, and conform the teachings of the Nazarene to the practices and principles of their political leader. This wicked and blasphemous exhibition of diseased minds seems only a little more impious and no less vain and impotent than the persistent attacks everywhere encountered upon popular government, the right and capacity of the people to direct and manage their own political affairs. Here and elsewhere, either by those who in their own land have destroyed the last vestige of personal liberty, sending to prison and to the torture chamber men and women because of race, religion, or political opinions and sacrificing all rights of the people to the gratification of personal power, or by those in our own land who consult appearances rather than realities and mistake surface indications for the deep currents which move below, is heard the solemn pronouncement that popular government has failed and constitutional democracy is dead.

We need not be dismayed but we cannot be unconcerned. The right to worship according to the dictates of one's conscience, the right to freedom from persecution on account of race, are parts of that political liberty, that freedom from oppression, which is the lifeblood of democracy. These things, together with free speech, a free press, the right of assemblage, and those guaranties, the sum total of which make up the inestimable blessings of personal liberty, are the things for which democracy stands. They are the things for which we stand. And I venture to believe that we will not fail to preserve them. Looking backward and looking forward, proud of our past and confident of our future, we shall find our highest service not only to our own but to mankind and to the peace of the world in transmitting these principles unimpaired to succeeding generations. This is our supreme duty. I believe that the foreign policy of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln will best enable us to meet and discharge that duty. I am, therefore, at all times, in periods of turbulence and in periods of calm, and without apology and without compromise, committed to its support.

This, it will be said, is isolation. It is not isolation, it is freedom of action. It is independence of judgment. It is not isolation, it is free government; there can be no such thing as free government if the people thereof are not free to remain aloof or to take part in foreign wars. People who have bartered away or surrendered their right to remain neutral in war have surrendered their right to govern. In matters of trade and commerce we have never been isolationists and never will be. In matters of finance, unfortunately, we have not been isolationists, and probably never will be. When earthquake and famine, or whatever brings human suffering, visit any part of the human race, we have not been isolationists, and never will be. In all those matters and things in which a free and independent and enlightened people may have a part, looking toward amity, toward peace, and the lessening of human suffering, we have never been isolationists, and never will be. But in all matters political, in all commitments of any nature or kind, which encroach in the slightest upon the free and unembarrassed action of our people, or which circumscribe their discretion and judgment, we have been free, we have been isolationists. And this, I trust, we shall ever be. If there be any truth established by the experience of nations, it is this: That to accommodate your foreign policies to the demands or in the interest of other nations at the peril of your own security is to invite contempt, and it seldom fails to earn a more substantial punishment.

In recent years much has been said, especially from abroad, about the provincial American. Those who discuss this and kindred matters modestly pay tribute to their own worth by speaking of world vision and of a wider human sympathy. One need hardly linger to discuss the subject. Regardless of what may be said by those whose purposes are apparent, let us hold fast to those political principles and foreign policies which others call provincialism, but which we call Americanism. It has served us well. It fits in with our scheme of democracy. It has built a civilization whose capstone is personal liberty. It may have its faults, as what earthly scheme has not. But all the world will have to testify that in great emergencies, in sublime moments, when civilization hangs in the balance, it is wanting neither in sympathy nor courage, and whatever faults it may possess are buried in the depth of a great unselfish and heroic purpose. It has no taste nor aptitude for the hazardous enterprise of uncovering aggressors or chastising national renegades. Here in its God-ordained home between two oceans, watchful of its own interests and vigilant in the defense of its rights, it covets nothing of others save the peace and friendship of all. It does not, and it never has, shrunk from its duty to civilization. It will not disown any obligation which human liberty and human justice impose upon a free people. But it does propose, I venture to prophesy, to determine for itself when civilization is threatened, when there may be a breach of human rights and human liberty sufficient to warrant action, and it proposes also to determine for itself when to act and in what manner it shall discharge the obligations which time and circumstances impose.

THE N.R.A. FROM THE FARMER-CONSUMER VIEWPOINT

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I have before me an address by Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, on the subject of the N.R.A. From the Farmer-Consumer Viewpoint, presented at N.R.A. public hearing at United States Chamber of Commerce Building, Washington, D.C., January 10, 1934, which I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As indicated by spokesmen for this organization at the time of the enactment of the National Recovery Act, we gravely feared that the effect of this act, originated, developed, and enacted almost overnight, would be to offset and, in large part, negative the anticipated benefits to agriculture expected under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

This latter act is one long contemplated and advocated by farmers and many business leaders; was based on a fundamental economic condition of long standing and fully recognized by several Congresses, and had been made one of the important planks in the platform and the speeches of the candidate of the party now in power.

We, therefore, viewed with great misgivings the overnight and necessarily hastily considered National Recovery Act, with its broad powers and full ability to set aside and cancel all the benefits of the legislation which the farm forces had so long and laboriously demanded.

We recognized, however, that the method of administering the National Recovery Act and the attitude of the Administrators would be the all-important determining factor as to whether or not our worst fears would be realized.

We heartily commended the principle of abolishing child labor and favored the principle of spreading the available work among a greater number of workers. We recognized the need for increased wages in certain industries where wage competition had forced the level down to an extraordinary degree.

But we also recognized that the N.R.A. opened the door of opportunity to business and labor to do the things which they have tried for years to do, but were restrained from doing, either by reason of the antitrust laws or by their inability to persuade Congress to grant them further privileges of restriction or compulsion. We recognized further that the consumer, being for the most part inarticulate, would in the natural course of events be the victim.

The time has come to assay the results of the operation of the N.R.A. to date and to determine whether or not our fears are being realized.

We present herewith a table giving the latest official figures prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture, showing the monthly index of prices received by farmers for their products, the monthly index of prices paid by farmers for commodities bought by farmers, and in a third column the quotient obtained by dividing the former index figure by the latter. This third column gives the purchasing power of the farmers' crops. These index figures take the 5-year pre-war period, August 1909 to July 1914, as the base called 100:

Farm prices and farm purchasing power for the year 1933

[Using 5-year base, August 1909-July 1914=100]

Month	Prices received by farmers	Prices paid by farmers for things bought	Index of farm crops' purchasing power
January	51	102	50
February	49	101	49
March	50	100	50
April	53	101	52
May	62	102	61
June	64	103	62
July	76	107	71
August	72	112	64
September	70	116	60
October	70	116	60
November	71	117	61
December 13	68	118	57.7

It will be noted that it also happens, by a curious coincidence, that in March of the past year, 1933, the index of prices the farmer had to pay for the commodities he buys stood at exactly 100. By a further coincidence, the index of prices the farmer received stood for the same month of March at 50. In other words, the purchasing power of the farmers' crops was just 50 percent of what it was in the pre-war base period.

It was for the purpose of correcting this very discrepancy, a discrepancy of long standing, that the Agricultural Adjustment Act was perfected by Congress last March and April and finally signed by President Roosevelt last May.

Now, note what has happened since March!

The farmer's price rose rather rapidly through April, May, June, and July—too rapidly, as it proved—jumping from an index of 50 in March to 76 in July. The prices paid by farmers rose only slightly, from 100 to 107, and the farmers' purchasing-power index went up to 71 percent of pre-war normal.

Things were looking up on the farm. The Agricultural Adjustment Act was apparently working as expected.

Then note what happened!

About the end of July the N.R.A. codes began to get in their influence. Only a few had been actually adopted by that time, but the very fact that industries had organized and anticipated higher prices had the effect of rapidly increasing the prices of industrial products. We know of several instances where manufacturers, secure in the belief that the adoption of their codes would bring much higher prices, proceeded at once and without waiting for the adoption of their code to agree to raise prices sharply.

At any rate, prices of manufactured commodities did rise rapidly and steadily, and on December 13, the last date for which Government figures are available, the composite index for things the farmer buys had reached 118.

Lumber and certain other building materials doubled or more than doubled in price. Data published in the December 23 number of the Consumers' Guide, issued by the Consumers' Counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, shows that wholesale prices on many articles increased from 50 to 144 percent between March and October. A portion of this increase is justified, no doubt, by increased costs to the manufacturer due to the operation of the Recovery Act, but by no means all of the increase can be accounted for in this way. At all events, the farmer, in common with other consumers, must pay all these increases in costs and selling prices.

The net result of these conflicting price tendencies is that the purchasing power of the farmers' crops has fallen to an index figure of 57.7 after having reached a high of 71 back in July; in other words, the improvement in the farmers' relative position, which seemed so promising in June and July under the influence of the operation of the A.A.A., has been very largely wiped out since June by the operation of the N.R.A.

We feel very keenly that unjust and improper price increases for manufactured goods have been made possible, and even encouraged, by certain well-defined features of the codes as permitted and approved by the administrators of the National Recovery Administration.

These objectional features center around price fixing or price enhancement either direct or indirect. They include methods of industry organization with which to make these price enhancements effective. Most manufacturers' codes place almost complete control in the hands of a few large dominant members of the industry. With the various tools and weapons placed in the hands of such a code authority, price increases are almost automatic.

A large percentage of the codes require open posting of prices. This is a first long step toward price determination and price enhancement. This device offers many opportunities for the dominant members of an industry to whip the price cutter or the low-cost producer into line. This is what industry has tried to do for years, but was largely prevented from doing through fear of the antitrust laws. Apparently the steel industry was quite successful along these lines before codes were thought of, judging from the firmness with which steel prices held throughout the depression even when production dropped to one fourth. This tremendous falling off in steel consumption may, incidentally, indicate what will happen in other lines if prices are forced up unduly under N.R.A. codes without a corresponding rise in consumer purchasing power.

The way seems open today for every well-organized industry to do through the aid of the N.R.A. approximately what the steel industry has done in the way of enforcing high prices.

Most codes include provisions prohibiting sales below cost. How the farmer would like to have and to be able to enforce a provision of this kind!

Most of these codes that prohibit sales below cost have tried to go further and define "cost" as "average cost", "reasonable cost", "representative cost", or some similar designation which would protect the less efficient producers. We give the N.R.A. officials credit for eliminating most of the provisions of this kind, but many have gotten through into the final forms of the codes. In the case of the retail lumber code not only is the "average cost" used as the basis below which no dealer may sell, but by a very recent ruling of the Administrator even this standard is increased so as to base selling prices on current high wholesale prices brought about by restriction of lumber production. Even higher prices for lumber must follow.

Wholesalers and retailers in many instances have demanded stated mark-ups and differentials which would virtually guarantee them an operating margin. They appear to think that they have a vested right in the scheme of things which the consumer must grant. The question of whether there may be too many distributors, or whether certain kinds of distribution may be too inefficient to deserve perpetuation, were apparently not considered. Many codes contain evident, or sometimes concealed, attempts to limit or destroy certain types of competing distribution that have proved themselves more efficient.

Most codes contemplate reduced production, either as a necessary result of the prohibition against sales below cost or by provisions for direct limitation of the installation or use of machinery.

Just how the Nation as a whole expects to have more wealth—that is, more things to divide—by each industry and each individual producing less is something no economist or politician has yet been able to explain to our satisfaction.

The shallow or facetious observer may be tempted to retort that the farmer is also doing these same things—limiting production and attempting to fix and raise prices. As already pointed out, the use of these methods under the Agricultural Adjustment Act was fully understood and stated in the purposes of the act itself to be to raise the level of farm-crop prices in relation to nonagricultural products in order to correct a maladjustment of 12 years' standing.

It must be evident to all that this desired national economic readjustment can never be attained if prices of nonagricultural products and services are to continue to rise as fast, or even faster, than agricultural products.

Many leading economists believe that the present economic break-down was due very largely to the severe maladjustment between agriculture and industry existing since 1921. Unless something is done at once to check the present price tendencies under the N.R.A. codes, and assist rather than hinder in the readjustment between agriculture and industry, the whole recovery program may be wrecked.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS AT FUNERAL OF FORMER SENATOR HANSBROUGH

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial address delivered by my colleague [Mr. NYE] at the funeral of former Senator Henry Clay Hansbrough at Washington, D.C., November 18, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark.

Our friend, Henry Hansbrough, has won that which he very clearly indicated, during his last months, he wanted most—death. He would not have us saddened today could a fond wish of his be granted, but with those to whom he remained close during his closing years there does linger a deep sadness, for men do not suffer the loss of friends with such ease as Senator Hansbrough would have us lose him. His wholesomeness, his warmness, his mellowness, his friendliness will long be missed in many of our circles.

It was only a week ago that he engaged in the last of his regular visits to us, active, aggressive, and cheerful, yet pronouncing a perfect willingness to depart this life, cheerfully awaiting his call, sure that he had enjoyed a most complete span of life.

How complete and all-encompassing that span was dawns upon us only after we review history written during his lifetime. Our extreme youth as a Nation and the breathless speed in which that youthful Nation has progressed are most strongly impressed upon us today as we gather to quietly pay tribute to the memory of Henry Clay Hansbrough, pioneer in many fields, newspaperman, Congressman, Senator, statesman.

Before us, forever stilled, lies one whose father was very close to and the recipient of many tokens of appreciation from that great pioneer in our national life, Henry Clay.

Our country has honored 27 men by election to the Presidency, yet Henry Hansbrough has lived through the administrations of 18 of these 27, and through the administrations of 11 of these he has been often most closely associated in shaping the policies and breaking the way for a Nation's destiny.

Three great wars have been waged during his lifetime.

Unbelievable progress in every walk of life and every undertaking has been witnessed by him.

To most of us the old Louisiana lottery is a matter of rather ancient history. Yet today we must be reminded that it was Senator Hansbrough who introduced the antilottery bill into the Congress of the United States that wrote "finis" to the practice.

A most prominent part has he played upon the national stage; and when one reviews, thus roughly and briefly, the occurrences during his lifetime, he concludes that it is little wonder that Senator Hansbrough during more recent months counted his span enough.

Eighty-five years left his mind no less keen in the closing years than it was during those years of greatest activity on his part, and though the pace of progress during his time had been truly breath-taking, his look into the future was one giving him conviction that those years of progress and change were not to be compared with the immediate years lying before us.

Henry Clay Hansbrough was born on January 30, 1848, in Randolph County, Ill., the son of Eliab and Sarah Hagen Hansbrough, who were natives of Kentucky and whose forefathers were Virginians.

His education was limited to such as was available in the public schools of that day, but in his early years he developed a love for the printing and journalistic profession and he is found, as a very young man, learning the art of printing in a shop in San Jose, Calif. In following years, as an employee on the famous San Francisco Chronicle, he was elevated to the position of assistant managing editor.

Conditions of health necessitated his coming into more northern climes, and we find him after his San Francisco experience, engaging in journalism at Baraboo, Wis. It was here that he heard the call of the Dakota prairies, and in 1881 he moved to Dakota Territory and established the Grand Forks News which he published until 1883 when he founded another newspaper, the Inter Ocean at Devils Lake, N.Dak.

Here he entered most actively and aggressively into the politics of the Territory which soon was to be made into new States of the Union. He served his city as postmaster; twice was he elected mayor of that city; and as the issue of statehood arises, Mr. Hansbrough is found in the front ranks of those battling for recognition of North Dakota as a State. At that time, in 1885, he was beyond question one of the two or three outstanding men in the Territory. Quite natural is it then to find him attending territorial conventions in 1888, where statehood was first officially discussed.

In 1888 he was chosen a delegate to the Republican National Convention and has been returned often to subsequent conventions of that party.

From 1888 to 1896 he was a member of the Republican National Committee, and with the admission of North Dakota as a State Henry Clay Hansbrough became its first Representative in Congress, serving there from November 2, 1889, until March 3, 1891. Deprived of renomination in that year, he sought and won that recognition which sent him to the United States Senate, where he served from that time until March 3, 1909.

Returning to his former business pursuits at Devils Lake, he there remained until 1919 when he retired and moved to Florida. Since that time he has resided at Water Mill, Long Island, N.Y., and in Washington, D.C., where he spent his declining years.

Indelibly did this statesman impress himself in the shaping of great national policies. During his years in Congress he won opportunity for lasting service to the States and the people of the West through his positions upon the Public Lands Committee, the Agricultural Committee, and the Finance Committee.

It was Senator Hansbrough who fathered the cause of irrigation which today is accepted as being quite a matter-of-fact thing, but which, in his day, required unending and uncompromising battle to win.

Close at our hand today stands the beautiful Congressional Library which was first occupied during our departed friend's chairmanship of the Joint Library Committee of Congress. He also served for many years upon the District of Columbia Committee and contributed largely to the building of this very beautiful Capitol City.

The deceased was married in 1879 to Josephine E. Orr who died January 14, 1895. A few years later he married Mary Berri Chapman, of Washington, who survives him.

Truly our friend saw a great deal of this life. That he enjoyed life every friend can attest. This enjoyment continued to the end except that it was easily seen that he was counting himself, of later years, thoroughly spent and ready for his grave. While he enjoyed much of life, there were, in his declining years, those disappointments and discouragements which could not do other than dampen his spirit, and on his last day, realizing that the end was near, he is found whispering to his dear friend the words: "Death is sweet; I hope it comes soon."

His State, his Nation, and its people owe Henry Clay Hansbrough a debt of gratitude. He served faithfully and well whenever his services were invited, and now we find this most democratic of democratic spirits in the democracy of the dead where, as another has put it:

"There is neither rank nor station nor prerogative in the republic of the grave. At this fatal threshold the philosopher ceases to be wise, and the song of the poet is silent. Dives relinquishes his millions and Lazarus his rags. The poor man is as rich as the richest, and the rich man is as poor as the pauper. The creditor loses his usury, and the debtor is acquitted of his obligation. There the proud man surrenders his dignities, the politician his honors, the worldling his pleasures; the invalid needs no physician, and the laborer rests from unrequited toil.

"Here at last is nature's final decree in equity. The wrongs of time are redressed. Injustice is expiated, the irony of fate is refuted; the unequal distribution of wealth, honor, capacity, pleasure, and opportunity, which makes life such a cruel and inexplicable tragedy, ceases in the realm of death. The strongest there has no supremacy, and the weakest needs no defence. The mightiest captain succumbs to that invincible adversary, who disarms alike the victor and the vanquished."

And thus Henry Clay Hansbrough would have it! To the democracy of the dead he moved willingly after illness of only a week, and without a trace of bitterness toward life or fellow man.

WILLIAM R. NELSON GALLERY OF ART

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, in Kansas City this last fall was opened the William Rockhill Nelson Gallery of Art and Atkins Museum, a wonderful monument to one of the great builders of Middle West. But great as that monumental gallery is, the greater monument to William Rockhill Nelson is the impress he, through his great newspaper, the Kansas City Star, made and left on the community and community life of which Kansas City is the center.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, the following well-deserved tribute from those who worked with Colonel Nelson, which appeared in the Kansas City Star of December 10, 1933.

There being on objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Kansas City Star, Dec. 10, 1933]

IF THOU SEEK HIS MONUMENT—

The name of William Rockhill Nelson blazes over Kansas City this week. But in centering attention on the art collection and the shining gallery that bear his name, we may overlook the wider contribution that its foremost citizen bestowed on the city of his heart.

That contribution came from his instinctive love of the beautiful in all its forms. The art collection was merely one direction in which his love gorgeously flowered.

When this bulky, middle-aged man stormed into Kansas City in the summer of 1880, he found a vigorous town absorbed in the business of making a living, still dominated by the frontier traditions of the trading center which has outfitted expeditions for the Santa Fe and Oregon Trails into the great western adventure. It had energy, elan, but it was conspicuously deficient in sweetness and light. Its people had come largely from the country or small towns. Many of them expected to make their pile and move on. They were not concerned with such refinements of civilization as garbage systems, paved streets, architecture, pictures.

Into this incongruous environment plunged a man who in spite of his English ancestry was essentially a Latin in his feeling for order, beauty, and splendor—a Lorenzo the Magnificent, with a dash of Jim Hill the builder and Oliver Cromwell the rebel.

REMOLDING THIS SORRY SCHEME

In later years Nelson used to say it was sheer selfishness that drove him to his never-ending campaign to make the sprawling frontier village into a modern city.

"I was going to live here, wasn't I? Well, Kansas City had to be made into a place that somebody besides a few dollar swappers would want to live in. By God, it was a groundhog case."

It was something more than that. Nelson could no more help trying to shatter this sorry scheme of things in order to remold it nearer to the heart's desire than he could help breathing. He was restlessness incarnate. He was forever driven by an inner demon to smash and build. And his building was directed by the fact that he belonged essentially to the civilization of beauty rather than to the civilization of the machine age.

"Don't talk to me about a campaign to bring a lot of cheap labor to Kansas City to make cotton prints", he once exclaimed to a delegation of town boosters. "Put on a campaign for an art gallery and I'm with you."

A BETTER CITY TO LIVE IN

A contractor, builder, political manager, and small town editor of Fort Wayne, Ind., he threw all his immense energy into the newspaper that he established. It was courageous, outspoken, above all human. He wanted to use it as a driving force for a better city. But it was to print fine and interesting reading matter. "Don't forget", he told his editors, "that Plato, Shakespeare, Macaulay, Huxley, wrote almost as good stuff as some of our moderns. I never pick up a standard book without finding an interesting passage. Let's pass some of those things on to our readers."

In such a detail as typography he painstakingly picked out a handsome dress for his paper that proved so adequate that the first page of the Star of December 10, 1933, is the lineal descendant of the first page of the Star of September 18, 1880.

At first his efforts were directed toward the fundamentals of a decent place to live in. The city was in the mud. It must be paved. It had wooden sidewalks. They must be made of permanent material. Garbage was dumped in vacant lots. It must be collected and disposed of. There were no shaded streets. Trees must be planted. There were no public baths. They must be obtained. There was no public hall. The "tightwads" must be shaken down and made to build one. There were no parks and boulevards. They must be provided. The city was built with checkerboard streets and commonplace houses. He would set an example for city planning and architecture in his own home and in the Rockhill district, with its winding, shaded roads, its dry stone walls covered with rambler roses and honeysuckles, its attractive small houses. The county was disfigured with "tin" bridges. He would build a double-arch stone bridge to show what should be done.

THE EUROPEAN ADVENTURE

But through most of this crusading period Nelson had not really found himself. He had not consciously discovered his allegiance to the world of beauty. This realization developed as a result of two years spent in Europe for the education of his daughter in the nineties.

While he traveled widely, his heart responded to the appeal of the magnificence of Paris and the loveliness of Italy. No one knowing Nelson can stand before the glorious Palazzo Vecchio in Florence without feeling the spiritual kinship between this modern spirit and the splendor that flamed in the soul of the Lorenzo who founded the Uffizi gallery and made the city on the Arno the cultural capital of Europe.

From this experience abroad flowed back the copies of great paintings that were to constitute the Western Gallery of Art, the forerunner of the new gallery. Nelson had come to love the paintings in the European collections. If his fellow townsmen could not see the originals, he was determined they should share his joy through seeing the best copies obtainable.

His own manner of living showed the effects of the foreign influence. He built over his house in the spirit of an old English manor. He picked up original paintings for it as opportunity offered. He instructed a member of his staff to have a catalogue made of his books and see that any important gaps were filled. He wanted what he called "a gentleman's library." On a visit to Oak Hill, Theodore Roosevelt, looking over his books, inquired for the Greek poets, and found them. "The Greek poets are almost a distinguishing mark of a gentleman's library", was Roosevelt's comment, to his host's delight.

THE DAILY W. R. NELSON

The Star he used as the vehicle to convey his ideas into literally every home in Kansas City twice a day. In many respects, he once observed, his newspaper deserved the name of "The Daily W. R. Nelson." Twenty years ago an editorial in the Star summed up humorously the reaction of objectors to the steady stream of advice that was poured over the city:

"Under the malign direction of Nelson the Star has kept things constantly stirred up. It has made tenants dissatisfied. They never used to complain about light and air. Now they won't look at a house unless every window opens on a flower garden with a humming bird in it. The Star won't let anybody alone. It insists on regulating the minutest detail of people's lives. Its regulations are pernicious and extravagant. Its preaching about more parks and boulevards and breathing spaces and supervised playgrounds for children, and plant Dorothy Perkins roses, and swat the fly, and housing reform, and a new charter, and art galleries, and keep your lawn trimmed, and take a lot of baths, and throw out the bosses, and use the river, and cut the weeds on vacant lots, and read the Home University Library, and for God's sake don't build such ugly houses, and make the landlord cut a window in the bathroom, and put goats in Swope Park, and why will mothers risk their babies' lives by bringing them up on bottles, and plant your bulbs now, and teach your children manners, and what's the use of lawyers, and cultivate a pleasant speaking voice, and build a civic center, and put out houses for the birds, and walk 2 miles before breakfast, and why are Pullman cars so hot in winter, and go to church, and cut out the children's adenoids, and build trafficways, and sleep with your windows open, and the square deal, and build cyclone-proof houses, and smash the saloons, and pooh, pooh on factories that employ women, and reduce street-car fares, and go look at old masters every Sunday, and use 2 by 6's instead of 2 by 4's if you want your house to stand up, and move out in the suburbs, and tear down the tin bridges, and build hard-surface roads everywhere, and all the other things, has increased the cost of living and given people inflated ideas, and pretty nearly ruined the town."

Gradually these admonitions for civilized living had their effect. The city became beauty conscious and took on its present aspects.

LOOK ABOUT THEE

The ruling passion of Nelson's life was embodied in the wills in which he and his family left their fortune to the art collection and the gallery that housed it. His entire estate, he provided, eventually should be gathered in the William Rockhill Nelson Trust and "the net income thereof used and expended for the purchase of works and the reproduction of works of the fine arts, such as paintings, engravings, sculpture, tapestries, and rare books, the purpose being to procure in this manner works or the reproductions of works of the fine arts which will contribute to the delectation and enjoyment of the public generally, but are not usually provided for by public fund."

As one looks out over the wide expanse of the city from the south porch of the gallery of art there comes to mind the famous inscription on the tomb in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, of its architect, Sir Christopher Wren: "Si monumentum requiris circumspice"—"If thou seek his monument, look about thee." So Nelson built his own far-flung monument.

GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in the President's Budget message of last week it was suggested that an Executive order had been issued placing all expenditures, emergency as well as normal, under the direction of one department. I desire to quote now, in connection with that order, from the Baltimore Sun of this morning, an article written by Frank R. Kent, indicating that the order has already been canceled. Mr. Kent's article is as follows:

Those who, shocked by the size of the deficit and debt figures revealed by the President last week, took comfort from his order placing control of all emergency expenditures under the Director of the Budget, Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, must feel as if the ground had been cut from under them this morning.

That order was hailed all over the country as gratifying evidence of the President's purpose really to balance the Budget in 1936. The expenditure of billions for recovery is essential, but the placing of a curb upon the spenders was equally essential. Up to date there has been neither audit nor control. The money has been poured out at the will of the spending directors. The White House order was seen as the one way in which the huge financial risk the new deal involves could be minimized. It was the safety device on a high-speed machine. The President, it was generally agreed, had acted wisely.

But in 3 days the President changed his mind and the order is rescinded. The announcement from Washington said that the order had been "modified", but that word is misleading. It merely camouflages the fact. The former status of unrestricted expenditures is restored. The various directors are required to make weekly reports to the Budget Director and he may make recommendations to the President. That, however, means exactly nothing. The Department directors report to the Budget Director after, not before, they make the expenditures, and he has no power over them. Anybody can find out what the expenditures are after they have been made. That knowledge is then public property. Newspaper men will know them before the Budget Director gets the reports. As for recommendations to the President, Mr. Douglas could make those recommendations, anyhow.

And what do a Budget Director's recommendations that too much money is being spent unwisely amount to after it is spent? All they will do is get him into a losing argument with the men who did the spending. That it would be a losing argument is proved by the fact that Mr. Douglas has made it a number of times already and lost every time. The rescinding of the order is the best proof of all.

What happened in that case was this: Mr. Roosevelt, after laying before Congress and the country a financial program involving tremendous outlay, unprecedented borrowing, and a deficit and debt beyond the most pessimistic forecasts, proclaimed a conservative policy by which, if prosperity fully returns, the national solvency can be regained in 1936. To this end, he announced that the heretofore unaudited and uncontrolled emergency expenditures would be subjected to approval of the Budget Director. It was the logical, safe thing to do. But it didn't suit the gentlemen who are spending the money. As soon as the order came out, Mr. Ickes, Mr. Hopkins, and Professor Tugwell, who, it is reported, will soon be made Under Secretary of Agriculture, went to bat. They pointed out that control by Mr. Douglas would "slow down" the program; that it meant the money could not be put out fast enough; that it would hamstring their plans.

Among them, they swung the President back, and Mr. Douglas was notified over the telephone that the order was annulled and he need not bother. He is just where he was, except that he can, if he likes, read weekly reports from the directors as to the money they spent. To do this would seem to give him needless pain. Mr. Douglas, loyal as anyone to the President, is recognized as a conservative—a man who likes to have solid ground under his feet. For a long time his attitude has annoyed the young liberals, with whom he has clashed frequently. The prompt cancelation of the proposal to make his job a real one naturally rejoices them. The report is that when notified the order had been rescinded Mr. Douglas acquiesced. What else could he do?

It is explained that the President's order still stands so far as having the expenditures pass under the eagle eye of the Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl. But Mr. McCarl has no power except to see that the expenditures are not made illegally. That does not mean a thing. The plain fact is that half a dozen different men here are spending huge sums without any real restriction or supervision. The President, like a good many others, recognized that there should be one supervising official, able to call a halt. He named such an official on Thursday and then canceled the designation Monday. It was, indeed, a Liberal victory.

TAXATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6131) to raise revenue by taxing certain intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the motion be stated by the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6131.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to have an understanding with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that at the conclusion of the consideration of the measure referred to in the motion of the Senator from Mississippi the Senate will recur to the calendar, because a number of Senators are interested in bills on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I do not think this legislation will take very long. There are not many controversial matters, if any, and I think we can expedite it. I am very anxious to get the bill out of the way today.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that; but I should like to have the understanding to which I have referred.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill mentioned, the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 6131) to raise revenue by taxing certain intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance, with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "This", to strike out "title" and insert "act", so as to read:

TITLE I

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "Liquor Taxing Act of 1934."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

SEC. 2. Paragraphs (3) and (4) of subdivision (a) of section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1918, as amended (relating to the tax on distilled spirits generally and the tax on distilled spirits diverted for beverage purposes) [U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1150 (a) (1) and (2)], are amended to read as follows:

"(3) On and after January 1, 1928, and until the effective date of title I of the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934, $1.10 on each proof gallon or wine gallon when below proof and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon; and

"(4) On and after the effective date of title I of the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934, $2 on each proof gallon or wine gallon when below proof and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon."

SEC. 3. Subdivision (c) of section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1918 (relating to the internal-revenue tax on imported perfumes containing distilled spirits) [U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1150 (a) (4)], is amended by striking out "$1.10 per wine gallon" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2 per wine gallon."

SEC. 4. In lieu of the rate of drawback provided in section 3329 of the Revised Statutes, as amended [U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1239], the rate of drawback allowed upon the exportation of distilled spirits exported on or after the effective date of this title shall be equal to the rate of the internal-revenue tax paid in respect of the distilled spirits exported but shall not exceed a rate of $2 per proof gallon.

SEC. 5. Section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (relating to the tax on deficiencies in distilled spirits production [U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1197], is amended by striking out "at the rate of $1.10" wherever such phrase appears and inserting in lieu thereof "at the rate of tax imposed by law."

SEC. 6. So much of section 611 of the Revenue Act of 1918, as amended (relating to the tax on still wines) [U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1300 (a) (1)], as reads:

"On wines containing not more than 14 percent of absolute alcohol, 4 cents per wine gallon, the percent of alcohol taxable under this section to be reckoned by volume and not by weight;

"On wines containing more than 14 percent and not exceeding 21 percent of absolute alcohol, 10 cents per wine gallon;

"On wines containing more than 21 percent and not exceeding 24 percent of absolute alcohol, 25 cents per wine gallon;

"All such wines containing more than 24 percent of absolute alcohol by volume shall be classed as distilled spirits and shall pay tax accordingly."

is amended to read as follows:

"On wines, containing not more than 14 percent of absolute alcohol, 10 cents per wine gallon, the percent of alcohol under this section to be reckoned by volume and not by weight;

"On wines containing more than 14 percent and not exceeding 21 percent of absolute alcohol, 20 cents per wine gallon;

"On wines containing more than 21 percent and not exceeding 24 percent of absolute alcohol, 40 cents per wine gallon;

"All such wines containing more than 24 percent of absolute alcohol by volume shall be classed as distilled spirits and shall be taxed accordingly."

SEC. 7. So much of section 613 of the Revenue Act of 1918 (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1300 (a) (2) as reads:

"On each bottle or other container of champagne or sparkling wine, 12 cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof;

"On each bottle or other container of artificially carbonated wine, 6 cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof;

"On each bottle or other container of liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds, by whatever name sold or offered for sale, containing sweet wine fortified with grape brandy, 6 cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof"

is amended to read as follows:

"On each bottle or other container of champagne or sparkling wine, 5 cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof;

"On each bottle or other container of artificially carbonated wine, 2½ cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof;

"On each bottle or other container of liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds, by whatever name sold or offered for sale, containing sweet wine fortified with grape brandy, 2½ cents on each one half pint or fraction thereof;

"Any of the foregoing articles containing more than 24 percent of absolute alcohol by volume shall be classed as distilled spirits and shall be taxed accordingly."

SEC. 8. Section 612 of the Revenue Act of 1918, as amended (relating to the tax on grape brandy and wine spirits withdrawn and used in the fortification of wines) (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1301), is amended by striking out "10 cents per proof gallon" and inserting in lieu thereof "20 cents per proof gallon."

SEC. 9. (a) Section 608 of the Revenue Act of 1918, as amended (relating to the tax on malt liquors) (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 26, sec. 1330 (a)), is amended by striking out "a tax of $6" and inserting in lieu thereof "a tax of $5."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to make a brief explanation of the proposed bill. This bill is practically the same bill that was passed by the House of Representatives, with only 5 dissenting votes, I believe. It proposes to raise the tax on liquors from $1.10 a gallon, which is the rate in the present law, to $2 a gallon. I may say that if the bill shall be enacted, the liquors imported from foreign countries not only will bear this $2 tax but will bear the tariff duty also. So in the case of imported liquor there would be the tariff duty of $5, plus the $2 tax, or a $7 tax. The principal provision of the bill is that providing for the increase in the tax on distilled spirits from $1.10 to $2.

Another part of the bill which was adopted in the House, and which was agreed to by the Senate committee, is the result of a suggestion of the Treasury Department that a stamp costing 1 cent be placed upon every bottle and every container, the object being to differentiate liquors which are legitimately sold from bootleg liquor.

There is another change in the law made by the proposed bill. The last time we passed a liquor tax bill, we imposed a tax of $5 a barrel on beer with an alcoholic content up to 3.2 percent. We have eliminated the 3.2-percent provision since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; and whereas beer with a content of over 3.2 percent has been heretofore subjected to a tax of $6, under the proposed legislation we levy a uniform rate of $5 a barrel. So if this proposal is enacted, the beer tax will be $5 a barrel, irrespective of alcoholic content.

I pass on to another change made by the committee and recommended to the Senate but not carried in the bill as it passed the House. The object of the change is primarily to keep the Federal Government from injecting itself into the sphere of State taxation; and at the same time we desire that the States refrain from injecting themselves into the sphere of Federal taxation.

Prior to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment no State had a gallonage tax. The privilege license taxes were imposed by the States, and considerable revenue was derived by them from that source. Gallonage taxes were imposed only by the Federal Government. Recently a movement has been started in some States to impose gallonage taxes, because of a desire to get some revenue, believing, perhaps, that there might be an interim between the convening of Congress and the imposition of a higher tax than $1.10. For instance, New York has placed a gallonage tax of $1 on each gallon of liquor. Pennsylvania, I believe, has imposed a gallonage tax of a dollar, Massachusetts a gallonage tax of 40 cents, Arizona and Colorado 80 cents, and so on.

We reduced the privilege license tax, or the occupational tax, on brewers of beer from a thousand dollars to $100. The tax fixed in the beer bill which we passed last year was a thousand dollars, and we are making the tax lighter to that extent. The committee refused to adopt an amendment proposed in the committee to reduce the beer tax from $5 to $3 a barrel, but we agreed to this reduction in the privilege license tax on brewers of beer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McADOO in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. When we passed the beer bill at the last session, the tax was fixed at $5 a barrel.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. One of the arguments for the imposition of a tax of $5 a barrel and no more was that it would enable the people dealing in beer to sell a glass of beer to the workingman for 5 cents a glass. Has that been the result?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not had the actual experience in the matter.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is not a workingman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. The information that comes to me is that they have not lived up to that promise. In certain places beer is sold at 5 cents a glass, but as a rule those dealing in beer have not fulfilled that promise.

Mr. BORAH. No; as a rule, Mr. President, they have not, and I think the exceptions are so rare that they would be difficult to locate.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I may say to the Senator from Idaho that it is my information that beer is sold at 5 cents a glass all over the city of Baltimore, which is just a few miles from here.

Mr. HARRISON. That is too far to go to get a 5-cent glass of beer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator from Missouri certain of his information?

Mr. CLARK. I have repeatedly heard it said, and I may say that I stopped and bought a glass of beer in Baltimore for 5 cents the last time I came through that city.

Mr. BORAH. I was informed this morning that there was practically no exception to the rule. It was earnestly contended that this tax of $5 was in the interest of 5-cent beer for the workingman. It was a false promise, as many contended at the time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, some months ago the President, realizing that the eighteenth amendment would be repealed, appointed a very select group of experts from the various departments in the administration to give immediate study to the amount of tax liquor might bear without perpetuating the activities of the bootlegger. A very splendid set of gentlemen composed that committee. They worked on the question for some 3 months and then made their recommendations. They recommended, in their report to the President, which was not adopted, that distilled spirits would bear a tax of $2.60 without perpetuating the bootlegger. The information given indicated that the cost of putting illegal spirits in the hands of an illegal retailer was $4.20 a gallon, including cost of manufacturing, graft, and various other payments he had to make, and that with a tax of $2.60, legitimate sellers of liquor could undersell the bootlegger.

In the departmental report to which I have referred, it was recommended to the President that it might work well if only one gallonage tax should be imposed; that if we should impose a $2.60 gallonage tax and give to the States which permit the sale of liquor and do not impose a gallonage tax a 20-percent credit the States might be encouraged not to impose these gallonage taxes.

Personally, I favor the idea very much of giving to these States this credit, because I fear that some States may continue to impose high gallonage taxes and do exactly what we here and now are trying to prevent; namely, impose too great a tax. We all appreciate that if the taxes are too high, the bootleggers will continue in business. So it was the best thought of the House of Representatives and of the Committee on Finance, after full consideration, that a gallonage tax of $2 imposed by the Federal Government would be about as high as we could go, and would be about as low as we ought to go. That rate should not interfere with the activities of the States in the imposition of reasonable gallonage taxes.

I may say, further, that in the proposed bill we continue to give to the States the sole authority to impose a tax on distilleries, and we impose such a nominal occupational tax or the privilege license tax that it does not inject the Federal Government into the field of the States and prevent them from obtaining the largest amount of revenue they can from that source. And that revenue has heretofore been quite large. New York, for instance, imposes a tax of $15,000 on a distillery. That is the highest, I believe. Other States impose lower taxes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand the bill as it comes from the committee, it makes no distinction in the amount of tax imposed upon alcohol for beverage purposes and that imposed on alcohol used for nonbeverage purposes, alcohol used in the arts and sciences.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that the committee considered that matter, because there were some protests over the country against the imposition of the $2 tax on alcohol. Of course, industrial alcohol, denatured alcohol, bears no tax, but it was thought in the committee, and the Treasury Department had the idea, that if we differentiated as between beverage and nonbeverage alcohol, we would get into confusion and trouble. The objections came from the perfume people and the drug people, because some alcohol is put into their products. The committee was told that that would not make a great difference, because the amount that goes into these extracts and into these medicines is quite small. It was an administrative difficulty, may I say, which precluded action on the part of the committee in regard to that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I was about to say, as the Senator from Mississippi has just said, that the Treasury Department emphatically asserted that they could not administer a law which made a distinction between alcohol used for beverage purposes and alcohol used for nonbeverage purposes. The Treasury officials were very insistent that no such law could be operative.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I merely wish to say that the Treasury Department stated that the aggregate difference in the tax would probably be $5,000,000; dividing that up among 125,000,000 people, the cost thereby would be probably not more than 12 cents per year per family.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I observe in subsection 4 of section 1 that the $2 tax on distilled spirits is " on each proof gallon."

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; and I may say that the same provision has been in every bill taxing liquors.

Mr. HEBERT. I understand that to be so. That means 100 proof, I believe.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. Will not the effect of that be that the tax will exceed $2 a gallon upon whisky ordinarily sold in the trade?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the liquor ordinarily sold is rectified liquor. The Government is going to get the benefit of that condition, just as it has under all prior bills, because from a gallon of liquor 100 proof a larger volume of liquor of the rectified character may be made, and the Government has always imposed additional tax on rectified liquor. We are merely following the traditional policy in this proposed legislation.

Mr. HEBERT. My understanding is that the practice in the trade is to produce liquor of about 50 to 65 proof. That means, does it not, that the tax to the consumer will be in excess of $2 a gallon? I am asking the question for my own information.

Mr. HARRISON. It must be remembered that the man who has a gallon of 100 proof can take it and make for himself probably 2 or 3 gallons of rectified liquor, and he sells it to the consumer at about the same price as he would the original gallon of 100 proof.

May I say to the Senator that we estimate obtaining from the additional tax on rectified liquors $33,000,000 annually.

Mr. HEBERT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Did I understand the Senator to say that there is an added tax on blended whisky?

Mr. HARRISON. Thirty cents a gallon.

Mr. COPELAND. That is the entire tax?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the added tax on rectified liquor. On every additional gallon that is made from the straight whisky.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator knows, of course, that there will not be any other kind of whisky on the market than blended whisky.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that there will not be, because the Government gets that much more tax.

Mr. COPELAND. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. HARRISON. And if the public will be satisfied with blended liquor, rectified liquor, we ought to be satisfied.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask to have the Senator explain in a word, if he will, what the additional tax to the Government then will be on rectified whisky as contrasted with whisky that is not rectified?

Mr. HARRISON. The additional tax will be 30 cents a gallon.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, the tax on rectified whisky will be 30 cents above the tax on pure whisky?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I understand. May I now ask another question concerning nonbeverage alcohol? Is it because of the difficulty of control of nonbeverage alcohol that the Committee on Finance objected to its being excluded from this regular rate?

Mr. HARRISON. Very largely; yes. As was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Treasury Department officials said they thought it would present an administrative difficulty if we were to put a different tax on nonbeverage alcohol from the tax put on beverage alcohol.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Mississippi is, of course, aware of the fact that in making carbonated beverages and ice cream and confectionery, baked goods, and similar products, there is used nonbeverage alcohol.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. And that the cost thereof comes directly out of the consumer of those goods. The tax in such case is placed on a consumer who is not likely to drink liquor but who is a consumer of food products in which nonbeverage alcohol is used. Did the committee take into consideration the fact that there would be this consumer tax?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and it was pointed out by those who represented the Treasury Department that the increase in the tax from $1.10 to $2 would probably make a difference along that line of 20 cents per family throughout the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. That is a small amount.

Mr. HARRISON. A very small amount.

Mr. COPELAND. I suppose the danger of diversion was also considered?

Mr. HARRISON. That was considered.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to say for the record that I am extremely sorry that there could not be found a way by which there could be an exclusion of nonbeverage alcohol from the terms of the bill, because of the fact that that substance does go into food products used by the average family. However, if it is estimated that the increased cost will only be 20 cents per family per year, that is not a very substantial amount.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that protests of this character appealed to me because such alcohol is used not only in various extracts but in medicines, and so forth. However, when the officials of the Treasury Department made the statement which they did, the whole idea of the committee was changed with reference to that matter, and the committee felt as did the Treasury Department officials that the kinds of alcohol could not be differentiated in fixing the tax.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator is right in the statement which has been made that the charge to the average family would only be 20 cents per year, not much should be said about it, because I recognize the difficulty attached to the administration of the law in order to keep alcohol from being diverted to beverage purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to know what those difficulties of administration are. Would they be serious difficulties? I should also like to have the chairman of the Committee on Finance state, if he will, what the administrative difficulties would be in imposing a different tax on non-beverage alcohol as distinguished from the tax on beverage liquor.

Mr. HARRISON. I have just said, Mr. President, that the Treasury officials stated that the administrative difficulties would be almost insuperable. I do not know that personally.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. One of the difficulties would be that the Treasury Department would have to follow every gallon of distilled spirits to its ultimate consumption in order to determine whether it went into medicine or beverage. That is one of the greatest difficulties. It is easy to see what an insurmountable task it would be to trace every bottle of liquor, every gallon, and every other quantity of liquor all over the country to its ultimate consumption.

Mr. HARRISON. May I further say in answer to the Senator from New York that I base my estimate of 20 cents increase per family per year upon the statement of certain gentlemen in the Treasury Department who came before our committee. I myself have no idea about it.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say, in line with what the Senator from Kentucky has just stated, that we did have to follow such alcohol as has been referred to in prohibition days, as alcohol was used for industrial and commercial purposes. So the Treasury did find a way to control the matter in the prohibition era. It would therefore seem to me that there might now be found a way to control it.

Mr. HARRISON. At that time the use of alcohol as a beverage was prohibited by law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Mississippi says that the Treasury Department is of the opinion that the administrative difficulties would be almost insuperable.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if that is true, it really answers the question why all possible efforts should not be employed to make a distinction. But I do not see why it would be so difficult. The obligation or the onus could be put upon those who prescribe for medicinal purposes, and so forth, the same as was done under prohibition.

Mr. HARRISON. I cannot say any more than I have said to the Senator. That was one of the main reasons that caused the committee to make no differentiation in the tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to divert the Senator from the subject, but I desire to call his attention on page 10 to the concluding paragraph of section 202 relating to stamps. That section provides:

> Such stamps shall be promptly affixed to the immediate containers of such spirits, except that when such spirits contained in bottles in closed cases are held for sale or sold otherwise than at retail, such stamps need not be affixed until the cases are opened or sold at retail, when such stamps shall be immediately affixed to the bottles, but such stamps shall be sold or transferred in connection with any sale or transfer of such spirits and the person in possession of such spirits shall be in possession of such stamps therefor.

Whisky is put up in cases, say 24 pints to the case. The stamps will not have to be affixed to the bottles but affixed to the case, and the stamps would be transferred to the man who purchases that case. If a bootlegger wants to have the Government testify that the liquor which he is selling is good, why can he not buy one of these cases? The stamps will be delivered to him; and then when he opens up the case and takes out the individual bottles, he can put in them what he wishes and attach one of the stamps that has been given to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course that would be a fraud on the Government and would subject him to penalties if he attempted to misuse the stamps in that way.

Mr. LOGAN. The bootleggers have never been much afraid of committing fraud.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that it seems to me that it affords an entering wedge that will enable bootleggers to do a bigger and a better business than they have ever done. It seems to me further that every provision down to the end of that paragraph ought to be stricken out. It is placing in the hands of the men who want to violate the law the very steps which are provided to show the authenticity or the legality of the whisky which is sold.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will see that at the bottom of page 10 the provision is made—

> And shall be sold by collectors to persons entitled thereto upon application therefor and compliance with regulations under this title * * *.

If the collector suspected that some bootlegger was trying to do that, he would not sell him the stamps.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; but there are so many respectable-appearing bootleggers, I think it is placing a great responsibility on the collector.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned if we could strengthen in the slightest the provisions of the law I should be very glad to do so. If the Senator will offer some suggestion on that subject, I shall be very glad to consider it.

Mr. LOGAN. I called the provision to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi so if he thought it should be stricken out he could move to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the main thing was to try to differentiate between liquors sold illegally and those sold legally.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is a very wise provision.

Mr. HARRISON. It has been called to my attention further that proof that the applicants are entitled to such stamps must be made.

Mr. LOGAN. But the bill says that when he purchases whisky the stamps must be delivered to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if he is entitled to purchase it he is entitled to receive the stamps, as a matter of course.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few brief words further. I want to make an optimistic statement. We have been hearing a good deal about large deficits, an unbalanced Budget, and so on. One of the reasons why the Finance Committee has driven so hard with reference to this proposed legislation is the desire to secure additional needed revenue as quickly as possible. We met immediately, reported the bill out quickly, and we are asking its immediate consideration by the Senate today, so that as soon as possible the bill may be signed and become a law in order that increased taxes may be collected under it for the American people. All of us can render a great service by pushing this measure along today.

I will give the Senate some figures. Of course, people entertain different ideas as to the amount of revenue that will be obtained because of the passage of this proposed legislation. Personally, I think that the estimate of a consumption of 140,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits annually, as made by the joint committee's expert and as made by the experts of the Tariff Commission, is correct.

It is my opinion that the estimate of the Treasury Department is rather low in assuming that consumption will be only 85,000,000 gallons. The other experts to whom I have referred estimated an annual consumption of 140,000,000 gallons. They base their estimate on the fact that before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment the per capita consumption of distilled spirits in this country ranged from 1.2 gallons to 1.5 gallons per person. According to those figures, which are based on statistics for many years, with our present population of about 125,000,000 people, we would have an annual consumption of 175,000,000 gallons of liquor in the United States; but because of the fact that our people have at least pretended to be advocates of prohibition and have lived presumably free from the curse of liquor for a number of years, and because we have not had the open saloon, and also because of the generally depressed economic condition of the country, we assume that the consumptive demand will not reach 175,000,000 gallons. It is, however, fair to estimate, in my opinion—and that is the opinion of the experts—that the consumption of distilled spirits will be about 140,000,000 gallons.

Starting with that estimated consumption, let us take some figures to ascertain what revenue we are going to derive this year from this source. If the gentlemen of the press gallery will obtain these figures and spread them, they might afford opportunity for a little more optimism on the part of the American people; they might lend a word of encouragement to the business of the country; they might still the tongues of some who are crying out against an enormous deficit and parading the Budget as being unbalanced today. What we are attempting to do is to provide for a sound, stable, and balanced Budget in this country, and I know of no measure which has been offered, certainly none in quite a long time, that will tend in greater degree toward making our receipts and expenditures balance and promoting a stable condition in our finances than this proposed legislation.

So, recurring to the figures, on the basis of a total consumption of 140,000,000 gallons, a tax of $2 a gallon on 115,000,000 gallons domestically produced would yield $230,000,000.

We must permit to come in from foreign countries, including Canada, where there are some 25,000,000 gallons of American-type liquor, an estimated 25,000,000 gallons. The imported liquor will bear not only the $2 tax, but also a $5 tariff rate at the same time, or a total tax of $7. The internal-revenue tax on that number of gallons would amount to $50,000,000, and the tariff would be in addition thereto.

On rectified spirits, a subject which we have discussed, we will obtain under the estimate $33,600,000 more.

As to wines I may say that we are trying to put the rate so low as to give encouragement to domestic production. In this measure we are not proposing any tampering with the tariff and so foreign wines will be permitted to come in in competition with the domestic product. From sparkling wines we ought to get about a million dollars and from still wines some $7,000,000.

From brandy for rectification, it is estimated that something less than a million dollars will be derived.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator let me finish this statement, and then I will yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. From occupational taxes on wholesale dealers in wines and spirits we ought to get a million dollars; from the retail dealers in wines and spirits we ought to get $5,000,000; from the rectifiers and blenders we ought to get something under a half million dollars; from import duties on distilled spirits at $5 a gallon it is estimated—as 25,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits must come in, inasmuch as we have not a sufficient quantity on hand in the United States—that $125,000,000 should be realized.

From wines of all types 14½ million dollars should be obtained. The grand total Mr President, will be $467,000,000, which is exclusive of the revenue to be derived from beer; and in the case of beer it may be mentioned that the receipts have been greater than the estimates. We ought to obtain this year from beer in the neighborhood of $160,000,000. Therefore, under this proposed legislation and the legislation affecting beer we ought to obtain an increased revenue of more than $600,000,000. Is not that worth thinking about? Ought not that give encouragement to those who are fussing about our Budget being unbalanced?

Mr. President, in closing may I say the situation in this country is improving daily; we are on the road to recovery, and such legislation as this will give impetus to the movement and will make our credit stronger. I hope that before the day shall have passed we may enact this measure into law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Mississippi that I am impressed by what he has just said, but I should like to ask the Senator a question for the record. I understand cider and grape juices are omitted, are they not; no tax is required to be paid on them?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; they are omitted from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator how much debate there was in the committee in connection with the proposed tax on wines containing not more than 14 percent of alcohol?

Mr. HARRISON. There was quite a discussion, because the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo]—who, of course, has the interest of California very much at heart, and the question of wine warms him up when he undertakes to discuss it—insisted on some reduction in the tax on such wines. But, I may say to the Senator, that, as he will note, we fixed the tax on wines at the same rate as that which was adopted by the House. We accepted their action on wines, which coincides very largely with the suggestions and recommendations of the departmental committee. They wanted to make the tax low. One of the Representatives from California stated that, in his opinion, it was a very fair tax. We have reduced the taxes in most instances below what they were under the old law prior to prohibition, as I think the Senator appreciates. Furthermore, the rates adopted are in line with carrying out the President's idea to give encouragement to the production of wines in this country; he wants the country to be more of a wine-drinking country than a liquor-drinking country. Those were the motivating causes that induced us to fix at such low rates the taxes upon wines.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator may also refer to another distinguished Democrat, Mr. Thomas Jefferson, who took the same view regarding it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Replying categorically to his inquiry, I will state that there was rather a prolonged discussion in regard to the tax upon wines. A motion was made to reduce the tax imposed by the bill upon those wines with a less alcoholic content than 14 percent. The Senator from California very ably championed the amendment, and a number of others, including myself, supported his view. The whole question was gone into very carefully, and the arguments were supported in part by the statement that when the hearing was had in the House it was understood that the tax upon distilled spirits would be $2.60 per gallon.

When the bill passed the House it reduced it to $2, and the Senate Finance Committee accepted that figure. It was therefore contended, and it seemed to me there was some justice in the contention—and those who were supporting the lower tax based their statement upon the assumption that the gallonage tax would be $2.60, and it was reduced to $2—that there ought to have been a compensatory reduction with respect to wines, particularly those with an alcoholic content of less than 14 percent.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad the Senator has made that statement, because the view he expresses is exactly the one I hold. If we are seeking, as the President is, to make this a temperance Nation, I am confident there should be encouragement of wine drinking rather than of distilled spirits. But it is not alone that. That is a very strong point, of course, and worthy of our attention, but beyond that is the fact that the raising of grapes is an agricultural industry. It is a very important industry in the western part of my State. Grapes are a crop that the farmers there grow on land peculiarly adapted to that purpose and not to others. It is a matter of great concern to them what the rate shall be.

When we fix a rate of 10 cents per gallon on a wine, that means a rate of $15 to $20 per ton of grapes, which is a tremendous tax. I am quite convinced it is too great a tax to place upon this particular agricultural product. The making of domestic wine means employment of labor. It means the promotion of agricultural prosperity. It means, also, supplying the need for bottles and casks and that sort of thing. There can be no doubt in my mind that if we wish to serve the country well, we cannot do better than to have the tax as low as possible upon wine of domestic production of low alcoholic percentage, in order that we may, by the very cheapness of an excellent product, encourage its consumption.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I was in error. It was my opinion that the departmental committee had recommended the rate incorporated in this proposal, but I find that they have not. The departmental committee recommended 16 cents a gallon. The House cut that rate to 10 cents a gallon and the Senate Finance Committee adopted the figure of the House.

May I say to the Senator, too, that Representative BUCK, of California, appeared before the committee with reference to the wine tax. Will the Senator permit me to read briefly from his statement, as follows:

> Mr. BUCK. I think if you will investigate that legislation you will find it is not discriminatory.
> Now, if I may proceed, I think I will be able to finish in a few minutes.
> You asked in regard to taxes. There was recently organized in California the California Wine Growers' Association, and I believe their representative appeared before you yesterday. While I don't know what concrete proposals he offered to you, I am willing to state on behalf of the North Coast Counties' Association and the State Chamber of Commerce, recognizing that at the present time some tax will no doubt be assessed against wine, and hoping you will make it as low as possible, they have asked me to present these as the maximum figures for you to consider, hoping you can see your way clear to make the taxes lower.

He suggested the tax, and the Committee on Ways and Means adopted the very tax he suggested. The Finance Committee of the Senate adopted the figure approved by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. What we have tried to do is to give them a low tax. May I say, too, that the tax on beer is 10 cents a gallon, and we have put only 10 cents a gallon on wine.

Mr. COPELAND. I know, but 90 percent of beer is water. When we place a tax on beer we are placing a tax on water. Nine tenths of the beer product is water. But here it is proposed to place a tax of 10 cents on from 13 to 16 pounds of grapes every time we tax a gallon of liquor. I feel that it is hardly fair.

I see in the bill that there is an effort to distinguish between wine of not more than 14 percent alcoholic content and wine not exceeding 24 percent alcoholic content. There is very little wine in the second category. How much does the committee estimate will be the income from wine of between 14 and 21 percent alcoholic content?

Mr. HARRISON. They did not put an estimate with reference to various classifications. They put it as a total on wine.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to call attention to the fact that there will be very little wine in the latter category. When we come to fortified wines, I have not a word to say. They ought to be taxed at a higher rate, the sherries, ports, and tokays; but the natural light wines produced in so many States of the Union ought not to be taxed so heavily. Wherever there is a production of grapes it could be largely increased; for instance, in Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Michigan, Washington, Oregon, and California. There are many States where the raising of grapes is an important agricultural industry.

I do not wish to impose my judgment upon the committee, but I feel that the rate upon wine of under 14 percent alcoholic content is too high. It ought to be lower. We have taken the tax off of cider entirely. It might well happen that cider would have a higher alcoholic content than many wines, and yet in deference to the farmer who produces cider we have taken away that tax. It is my hope that the committee on further consideration may see fit to reduce the tax upon the light domestic wines.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator before he takes his seat that it was suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and it was suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and, I think, by the attorney representing some of the wine producers, that because we had reduced the tax from $2.60 on hard liquor to $2, a proportionate reduction ought to be made on wines. But there was no reduction in that respect because we expected to give to the States that which would absorb the difference between the $2 and the $2.60. Under that formula we reduced the tax from $2.60 to $2, which is a reduction of 23 percent from the recommendation of the departmental committee. The House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate reduced the rate on wine from 16 cents to 10 cents, a reduction of 38 percent on wine, so as a matter of fact proportionately we have given to the wine people a much greater reduction than we did to the others.

Mr. COPELAND. I have not followed the legislative procedure this morning closely enough to know, but is the Finance Committee making some amendments to the bill so it will have to go to conference, anyway?

Mr. HARRISON. In my opinion, if the Senate should pass the bill as it stands now, the House would no doubt concur in the amendments that are proposed by the Finance Committee because they are for the most part purely clerical.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask if the Senator would not be willing to take back to the committee on conference a lower rate on the domestic white wines?

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator there was great influence at work to increase the wine rate, but in the interest of compromise we adopted what the House had approved so we might expedite the matter. There is really more reason and more argument to be advanced to increase the wine rates than to lower them.

Mr. COPELAND. Needless to say I would not make a suggestion which would lead to a higher rate, but of course if we were to fix the rate at 5 cents and the House fixes it at 10 cents, the conference committee could not bring in a higher rate than 10 cents. I am not much impressed by what the Senator said. Would he not be willing to take to conference a suggestion of a lower rate? Then, of course, if he finds he is outnumbered and outvoted, I should be content. I do think, for the reasons which I have tried to state, and I realize I have stated them very weakly, that we ought to have a lower rate upon the domestically produced wines of low alcoholic content, first in the interest of temperance, and next in the interest of agriculture. I suggest to the Senator that he accept the lower rate for that reason.

Mr. HARRISON. I am in entire agreement with the Senator's conclusion, except that I think the rate we have given them is low enough; in fact, it is really too low. I am going to stand by the committee's recommendation, however. Let me call to the Senator's attention the fact that if we amend the bill in that respect it will naturally have to go to conference, and every day of delay resulting from having the bill in conference will cost the American taxpayer around three quarters of a million dollars. It would be very well, therefore, if we could pass the measure and not have it sent to conference.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I heard the Senator say that he expects to collect $7,000,000 from this tax. That means, then, that if we were to reduce the rate to 5 cents instead of 10 cents, it would be 3½ million dollars instead of $7,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Seven million one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COPELAND. That is it. That 3½ million dollars—the difference between 5 cents a gallon and 10 cents a gallon—comes out of the budget of every grape grower in the United States where those grapes are used for the production of what we regard as a temperance beverage.

Three and a half million dollars is a tremendous sum to these people who have small vineyards, but it is a very small sum to the American people. We are striving here all the time to help agriculture. We are trying to increase the buying power of the people. We are trying to help the subsistence farmer. Here is a chance, by lowering this rate from 10 cents to 5 cents, to help the groups of people we are discussing.

I beg of the Senator that he will take back to the House a proposal from us that the rate be lowered. There might be some compromise, and on the other hand there might be an unwillingness on the part of the House to yield; but at least no harm would result, because if there are differences between the two Houses, as has already been provided for by what we have done, there will have to be a conference anyway.

So I beg of the Senator to accept a lower rate and see what happens to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I know how very anxious the Senator is about this matter. He has talked to me privately about it. He has been very insistent about it, and I know how he feels toward the grape growers of New York; but I hope he will not insist on an amendment that might delay the consideration of the bill. I am sure the committee thought we were giving the grape growers a pretty low rate, and that this rate will encourage production. If it does not work out that way in the course of time, of course the Senator, with his tremendous power and influence, will come in here and get a reduction of the rate; but I ask the Senator not to insist on it at this particular time.

Mr. COPELAND. The tongue of the Senator is so seductive and honeyed that it is difficult for me to resist him. I do not know whether or not there is any sentiment in this body in favor of a lower rate. If there are Senators here from other States where grapes are produced, I think they should express themselves.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not from a State where grapes are produced; but I will say to the Senator that his constituents ought to be somewhat satisfied and pleased with the action that was taken by the Ways and Means Committee in the House bill, in that while the interdepartmental committee recommended the same rate upon wine as upon beer—16 cents per gallon—the committee of the House reduced that rate in the case of wine to what is equivalent to 10 cents per gallon.

That is quite a concession. This action was concurred in by the Finance Committee. In the Committee on Finance those who thought that beer was a more popular and less harmful drink strongly urged that the rate upon beer be reduced to $3 per barrel. So already something has been accomplished in the way of reducing the rate from that recommended by the interdepartmental committee.

Let me say to the Senator further that a given flask of wine that would be taxed 2 cents would be taxed, if we substitute beer, 3.2 cents. In other words, a given amount of beer is taxed 3.2 cents, while an equal amount of wine is taxed only 2 cents.

After giving this matter rather careful consideration, I reached the conclusion that the report of the interdepartmental committee is a very satisfactory one. While I felt at the outset that the tax on beer was in excess of what it ought to be, beer being the popular drink of the masses of the American people, I came to the conclusion, after we reduced in the committee the occupational tax for brewers from $1,000 to $100, that we ought to accept the beer and all other rates. I think the matter has been very reasonably worked out, and in view of our fiscal needs the rate on wine does not seem to me to be exorbitant.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, whatever the Senator from Massachusetts says to me always bears great weight, as he knows; but he apparently did not hear me say a little while ago that 90 percent of the content of beer is water. If we should permit the wine producer to add 90 percent of water to his product, then we would have wine and beer on the same plane; but here we are placing upon the grapes of Massachusetts, the farmer's product, a tax of eighteen to twenty dollars a ton.

Mr. WALSH. The theory of levying these taxes was based upon alcoholic content; but in view of the argument made by the Senator, the tax on beer is out of balance if it contains 90 percent of water.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is true as contrasted with this proposed rate on wine. I should say that beer ought to be taxed about one half of 1 cent in the same proportion. I am not going to press the matter, however, until I find out whether Senators from other grape-growing States are willing to be silent and to give no support to what I have in mind in the cause of temperance and the support of agriculture.

Of course, I am so outnumbered that it is useless to continue the discussion; but I hope there may be developed here some sentiment in favor of supporting and helping the agriculturist producing grapes, and giving him some of the "gravy" of life, and at the same time promoting the cause of temperance by making domestic wines as cheap as they may possibly be.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. Have we reached title II yet?

Mr. HARRISON. No. Does the Senator desire to offer an amendment now?

Mr. FESS. No; but I wish to propound an inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me there is some confusion. The Senator states in the report that the provisions of title II do apply to transportation, whether for sale or not. It will be noted that the provision is that a consumer can buy unstamped liquor without subjecting himself to penalty, and can, when he has taken it home, possess it without penalty, but the penalty will be applied on transportation.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is reading from the House bill. We eliminated the transportation company from the Senate bill. We cured what we thought was a defect in that respect.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 6, after line 4, to insert:

(c) Paragraph "First" of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"First. Brewers shall pay $100 in respect of each brewery: Provided, That any brewer of less than 500 barrels a year shall pay the sum of $50. Every person who manufactures fermented liquors of any name or description for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be deemed a brewer."

So as to read:

(b) Subsection (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue by the taxation of certain nonintoxicating liquor, and for other purposes", approved March 22, 1933, is hereby repealed.

(c) Paragraph "First" of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"First. Brewers shall pay $100 in respect of each brewery: Provided, That any brewer of less than 500 barrels a year shall pay the sum of $50. Every person who manufactures fermented liquors of any name or description for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be deemed a brewer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 21, after the word "so", to strike out "paid" and insert: "paid, not including in the computation of the tax so paid the 30-cent tax imposed by section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1918"; on page 7, line 8, after the word "so", to strike out "paid" and insert "paid, not including in the computation of the tax so paid the 30-cent tax imposed by section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1918"; and on page 8, line 11, after the words "and a", to strike out "corporation" and insert "corporation; and the term 'distilled spirits' includes products produced in such manner that the person producing them is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, as amended", so as to read:

SEC. 10. (a) Upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this title takes effect, are held by any person and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax equal to the amount, if any, by which the tax provided for under this title exceeds the tax so paid, not including in the computation of the tax so paid the 30-cent tax imposed by section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1918.

(b) Upon all articles specified in section 6 or 7 of this title produced in or imported into the United States upon which the internal-revenue tax imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this title takes effect, are held by any person and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax equal to the amount, if any, by which the tax provided for under such sections of this title exceeds the tax so paid, not including in the computation of the tax so paid the 30-cent tax imposed by section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1918.

(c) Upon all wines held by the producer thereof upon the day this title takes effect and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax equal to the amount, if any, by which the tax provided for under section 8 of this title exceeds the tax paid upon the grape brandy or wine spirits used in the fortification of such wine.

(d) The person required by this section to pay any floor tax shall, within 30 days after the effective date of this title, make return under oath in such form and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe. Payment of the tax shown to be due may be extended to a date not exceeding 7 months after the effective date of this title, upon the filing of a bond for payment in such form and amount and with such sureties as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of internal-revenue taxes on distilled spirits or wines shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with this section, be applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by this section.

(e) As used in this section and in title II, the term "person" includes an individual, a partnership, an association, and a corporation; and the term "distilled spirits" includes products produced in such manner that the person producing them is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

SEC. 11. As used in this act, the term "internal-revenue taxes" does not include taxes imposed under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

SEC. 12. This title shall take effect on the day following its enactment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 22, after the word "possess", to strike out "for sale"; in the same line, after the word "buy", to strike out "for sale"; on page 9, line 13, after the word "paid", to strike out "or"; in line 14, after the word "spirits", to strike out "held on the effective date of this title by any person and"; in line 16, after the word "for", to strike out "sale" and insert "sale; or" and the following:

(g) Any regularly established common carrier receiving, transporting, delivering, or holding for transportation or delivery distilled spirits in the ordinary course of its business as a common carrier.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 201. No person shall (except as provided in section 202) transport, possess, buy, sell, or transfer any distilled spirits, unless the immediate container thereof has affixed thereto a stamp denoting the quantity of distilled spirits contained therein and evidencing payment of all internal-revenue taxes imposed on such spirits. The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(a) Distilled spirits placed in a container for immediate consumption on the premises or for preparation for such consumption;

(b) Distilled spirits in bond or in customs custody;

(c) Distilled spirits in immediate containers required to be stamped under existing law;

(d) Distilled spirits in actual process of rectification, blending, or bottling, or in actual use in processes of manufacture;

(e) Distilled spirits on which no internal-revenue tax is required to be paid;

(f) Distilled spirits not intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale; or

(g) Any regularly established common carrier receiving, transporting, delivering, or holding for transportation or delivery distilled spirits in the ordinary course of its business as a common carrier.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 207, on page 12, line 15, after the word "title", to insert "or who places any distilled spirits in any bottle which has been filled and stamped under this title without destroying the stamp previously affixed to such bottle"; in line 23, after the word "sells", to insert "or transfers"; and on page 13, after line 1, to insert "Any officer authorized to enforce any provision of law relating to internal-revenue stamps is authorized to enforce the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 3, 1897, relating to the bottling of distilled spirits in bond", so as to read:

SEC. 207. Any person who violates any provision of this title, or who, with intent to defraud, falsely makes, forges, alters, or counterfeits any stamp made or used under this title, or who uses, sells, or has in his possession any such forged, altered, or counterfeited stamp, or any plate or die used or which may be used in the manufacture thereof, or any stamp required to be destroyed by this title, or who makes, uses, sells, or has in his possession any paper in imitation of the paper used in the manufacture of any such stamp, or who reuses any stamp required to be destroyed by this title, or who places any distilled spirits in any bottle which has been filled and stamped under this title without destroying the stamp previously affixed to such bottle, or who affixes any stamp issued under this title to any container of distilled spirits on which any tax due is unpaid, or who makes any false statement in any application for stamps under this title, or who has in his possession any such stamps obtained by him otherwise than as provided in sections 202 and 203, or who sells or transfers any such stamp otherwise than as provided in section 202, shall on conviction be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding 5 years, or by both. Any officer authorized to enforce any provision of law relating to internal-revenue stamps is authorized to enforce the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 3, 1897, relating to the bottling of distilled spirits in bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 9, after the word "and", to strike out "section 203" and insert "sections 202, 203, and 205", so as to read:

SEC. 208. This title shall take effect on the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, except that this section and sections 202, 203, and 205 shall take effect on the enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

AMENDMENT OF EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ACT (H.DOC. NO. 212)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress:

I have already suggested to the Congress that one of our tasks, in the light of experience, is to improve and perfect previous legislation.

I now recommend that the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1933 be amended to provide responsibility by the Government for the payment of the principal of, as well as interest on, bonds issued.

Two billion dollars of bonds were authorized. While the interest was guaranteed, the ultimate obligation of the Government for payment of the principal was not legally assumed. We should supplement what most of us frankly believe to be the moral responsibility of the Government by adding the necessary legal responsibility. The result of providing a bond on which both the principal and interest are guaranteed would be to put such bonds on a par with Treasury securities.

By setting up a corporation to issue these bonds, the important task of refinancing agricultural indebtedness can be continued on virtually a self-sustaining basis.

The Farm Credit Administration is expediting the disbursement of funds. In order that progress in making loans may be uninterrupted, I hope that the Congress will give attention to this subject as soon as possible.

It is true that technically the responsibilities of the Government will be increased by the amount of $2,000,000,000, but it seems in every way right that we thus publicly acknowledge what amounts already to a moral obligation.

In any event, the securities to be offered are backed, not only by the credit of the Government, but also by physical property of very definite value.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1934.

TAXATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6131) to raise revenue by taxing certain intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have two amendments which I desire to offer. They are suggested by the Treasury Department. One is to be inserted on page 13, and I will ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 7, strike out all after "Sec. 208" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

This title shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, except that if on or before the twentieth day following the date of the enactment of this act the Secretary of the Treasury finds that it is impracticable to put this title into effect on the thirtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, and so proclaims, specifying the date, not later than the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, on which it will be practicable to put this title into effect, this title shall take effect on the date specified in such proclamation. Notwithstanding the previous provisions of this section, this section and sections 202, 203, and 205 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I will state the object of the proposed amendment. The pending measure, if enacted, will go into effect in 60 days, according to the present provision. The Treasury thinks it can have the stamps printed and the other arrangements made within 30 days, and this amendment is to take care of that situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest one other amendment. I understand that sometimes liquors are put into containers containing less than a pint, and instead of imposing a tax of 1 cent on such containers I propose an amendment to make the tax lower than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 1, after the word "stamp", the Senator from Mississippi proposes to insert the following:

Except that in the case of stamps for containers of less than one half pint the price shall be one quarter of 1 cent for each stamp.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to ascertain from the Senator from Mississippi as to what the difference in revenue from that reduction would be.

Mr. HARRISON. The revenue feature did not enter at all into our consideration of this amendment. Our object was merely to try to distinguish between so-called "legitimate" liquor carried in containers or bottles, and "bootleg" liquor. It was shown to us that liquor is sometimes put into containers of one tenth of a pint. In such a case it would cost 84 cents a gallon if the manufacturer had to pay a cent tax on each such container. We thought that was unfair, so we propose to make the tax one quarter of a cent on that kind of a container.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I was unavoidably detained from the Chamber for a few moments, and I should like to make inquiry of the Chair as to whether or not there was further discussion of that portion of section 202, appearing on page 10 of the bill, which was called to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi by the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], now presiding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no further discussion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. With reference to that particular part of section 202 which was brought to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], I desire again to call the matter to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

The language in paragraph 202, on page 10, beginning with line 4, the word "such", is as follows:

Such stamps shall be promptly affixed to the immediate containers of such spirits, except that when such spirits contained in bottles in closed cases are held for sale or sold otherwise than at retail, such stamps need not be affixed until the cases are opened or sold at retail, when such stamps shall be immediately affixed to the bottles, but such stamps shall be sold or transferred in connection with any sale or transfer of such spirits and the person in possession of such spirits shall be in possession of such stamps therefor.

I interpret that to mean that when one is engaged in the business of distilling or manufacturing liquor, and making sales to wholesalers, who in turn sell to the retailers, when the bottled liquor, in case, is delivered from the manufacturer or the distiller to the retailer, each case is to be accompanied by stamps sufficient to be pasted upon each bottle sold at retail.

It is my opinion that this measure should require before the distiller or the manufacturer permits such cases to leave the factory or the doors of the distillery, every single bottle in a case should be stamped by the distiller, who is then in the possession of the revenue stamps.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the provision to which he is referring applies only to liquor that is held at the date this proposed act shall take effect. It will not apply in the future.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It will not apply to the future?

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. KING. It is not prospective.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Then I have no objection to that portion of the measure.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi for a moment. I hold in my hand a telegram which I should like to read to him. It is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., January 10, 1934.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building:

Thanks for your interest. Hope proposed stamp tax, of which I read in Herald this morning, does not apply to flavoring extracts and medicinal preparations containing alcohol—would be disastrous to sale of small-size packages.

GEORGE H. BURNETT.

I want the RECORD to show that there is no occasion for the alarm expressed in this telegram because at no time has there been a requirement, under past laws or regulations, for a stamp tax upon extracts or medicines. I understand that this provision for a stamp tax applies only to spirituous liquors. Am I correct in making that statement?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill, but I desire to speak briefly on the subject of the tax upon beer. In the committee I offered an amendment seeking a reduction in this tax in the hope and expectation that it might result in furnishing the public with a glass of beer at the popular price of 5 cents.

Some of the Senators have already, through inquiries made of the Senator from Mississippi, indicated that the public was unable under existing conditions and taxes to receive a glass of beer for 5 cents. I have made some inquiries and studies into the subject, and I find that the interdepartmental committee found that beer was being sold at wholesale at $12 per barrel. The very best of beer, I understand, is not more than $15 per barrel. The usual price, however, is about $12 per barrel, and this wholesale price includes the tax that has been levied upon beer, namely, $5 per barrel. There are over 490 glasses of beer in a barrel. There being 490 glasses of beer in a barrel, the retailer has been receiving at 10 cents per glass about $50 for the barrel of beer which cost him but $12.

Under these facts, which are not seriously disputed, it would seem to me to indicate that the tax of $5 a barrel should not prevent a reasonable profit to the retailer and the possibility of a glass of beer for the working class at 5 cents per glass, for if the retailer can purchase beer at $12 per barrel, and as there are 490 glasses of beer in a barrel, it can readily be seen that the retailer will be able to make a very substantial profit on beer at 5 cents a glass, amounting to as much as 100 percent of the wholesale price.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. KING. It occurred to me when the matter was under discussion in the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Massachusetts and myself are members, that there ought to be some difference in the charges between beer which has an alcoholic content of 3.2 percent and less as compared with beer which has a higher alcoholic content. I was wondering if the Senator has given any thought to that particular subject. It seemed to me then, as it does seem to me now—and I was not satisfied with the action of the committee—that we ought to have made some differentiation between the two classes of beer.

Mr. WALSH. I have entertained, Mr. President, the same opinion the Senator has just expressed. There are, however, certain difficulties in the way of levying a different tax upon beer with 3.2 percent alcoholic content and beer with a higher alcoholic content. First of all, the matter of administration. The Treasury Department stated it would be very difficult, if not impossible, of administration. There are, however, other difficulties.

There has been an underneath fight, I will say with the Senator's permission, between the producers of light beer and the producers of heavier beer, known as "ale", and it was originally proposed that a separate tax be imposed upon beer known as "lager" and a higher tax upon beer known as "ale." All that was discussed before the Committee on Ways and Means, and they finally concluded that the best way to handle the problem was to levy a flat tax of $5 per barrel on all types of beer, regardless of alcoholic content. I will say to the Senator that I have reached that conclusion too, after first being greatly impressed with the fact that there should be a difference in the taxes as between beer which is not intoxicating and beer which may be intoxicating.

A concession has already been made on beer that is intoxicating. Under the present law the tax on beer, other than 3.2 percent, is $6 per barrel. This proposed rate is $5 per barrel. As the Senator also knows, the rate now upon the 3.2 percent beer is $5 a barrel. So that the rate that is imposed in this measure does not make any increase.

I am satisfied from a review of the discussion that there is no reason why the American public cannot, with a $5 barrel tax, get a 5-cent glass of beer, unless there is some profiteering along the line. I am also informed by the experts of the Government who have reviewed this subject that practically all beer in Milwaukee is 5 cents per glass now. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] this morning informed the Senate of the fact that good beer can be obtained in the city of Baltimore at 5 cents a glass, and I am also informed that there are places in Washington where one can get beer at 5 cents a glass.

It seems to me that on the whole this rate is fair, and especially in view of the fact that there is such great need of revenue, and a reducing of this rate would very substantially reduce the total revenues that the Government is going to receive.

The Committee on Finance did, however, make a concession with the idea of lessening the argument that we were taxing the beer industry too much, by reducing the occupational tax paid by the brewer from $1,000 to $100. That is to the advantage of the brewing industry in reducing its overhead and the cost of producing good beer at a popular price.

I am content, Mr. President, as I said before, that the interdepartmental committee have done a very good job in their study of this question and in the rates they have recommended. They have carried out the wishes of the President and of the members of the committee to recognize this as a social problem as well as a revenue problem; therefore the rates have not been extreme on either spirituous liquors or on beer or upon wine.

The rates do not interfere with the desideratum of providing fine beverages at reasonable prices to the American public.

I hope the bill will pass without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of title I, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

Section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1918", approved March 3, 1917, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. Whoever shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, into any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, the laws of which prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both; and for any subsequent offense shall be imprisoned not more than 1 year."

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal any provision of section 1110 of the Revenue Act of 1918.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the amendment which I have just offered is designed to repeal a portion of what was known as the "Reed amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill of 1917." That amendment consisted of two parts. The first part prohibited the sending by mail or express into any dry State of any periodical or newspaper containing advertisements of spirituous liquors. The second portion of the Reed amendment prohibited the shipment into a dry State of any beer or spirituous liquors.

The first part of it is now working a great hardship on a great many newspapers, and is not serving any useful public purpose whatever. I do not think it will be gainsaid that, as a fundamental proposition, advertising of liquor does not increase the gross sale or gross consumption of liquor. It may change the distribution between various firms that are manufacturing liquor, but certainly nobody begins to drink liquor because he reads an advertisement of it in a newspaper.

As it operates at present, some newspapers are compelled to get out as many as five or six different editions in order to conform to the various laws of different States into which they are sent. Under the present law magazines are going out constantly with great blank spaces where advertising has been left out.

I do not believe any purpose whatever is to be served by maintaining that portion of the amendment on the statute books. The amendment as drawn retains in the statute the prohibition against shipment of liquor into dry territory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator as a legal proposition, and I should be very glad to get his view, whether the repeal of the law which his amendment contemplates would prohibit a State that was controlled by very dry sentiment from passing an act forbidding advertisements of the sale or manufacture of alcoholic liquors forbidden to be sold within the State?

Mr. CLARK. I do not think it would.

Mr. KING. In other words, the Senator does not think that the Congress would have the right, under the interstate commerce power which it possesses, to prohibit a State which is dry from prohibiting such advertisements within the State?

Mr. CLARK. That is not my opinion.

Mr. KING. Would not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri really go a little farther than he contemplates?

Mr. CLARK. I do not think so. The only extent to which my amendment goes is simply to strike out certain language in the so-called "Reed amendment" to the Post Office appropriation bill of 1917. It was necessary to set out the second part thereof in this amendment because the penalties were contained in the part which I am seeking to strike out. I have simply rewritten the second portion of the existing Reed amendment to include the penalties in that section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this amendment is similar to the amendment that was incorporated in the law legalizing 3.2 beer?

Mr. CLARK. Precisely; it conforms exactly to what we did in the case of the beer bill.

Mr. WALSH. It is simply extending the principle that was applied in the case of 3.2 beer?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does it change the penalty provided in the Reed amendment?

Mr. CLARK. No penalty is contained in the first portion of the provision which I am seeking to strike out. I have simply rewritten it and applied its other portion to the pending bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course, we were going to have another bill that will come along to which this amendment would more aptly apply. I have no objection to the idea.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. What I should like to be assured of is that this amendment—I have not had an opportunity to read it—does not give any advantage to the periodicals and newspapers outside a State over papers published within a State in the matter of carrying advertising.

Mr. CLARK. It gives none at all; it simply repeals the provision of the present law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is something that we should be very certain of, I think, because certainly publications within a State should have the same advantage and the same opportunity for carrying these advertisements that are enjoyed by papers without a State that might circulate within a given State.

Mr. CLARK. It gives them no advantage whatever. As the Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out, it is precisely the same provision that was contained in the beer bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have no objection to the amendment; I just wanted to raise that question and to make sure with regard to that particular point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it seems to me that for the proper protection of the "dry" States the language the Senator seeks to have repealed ought to be retained, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 13. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all wines and distilled spirits when imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam), or when withdrawn from bond for consumption or use, if such wines or distilled spirits are exported directly or indirectly from any foreign country which is in default on its national indebtedness to the United States incurred in connection with the World War, the following duties, respectively: On wines, $3 per gallon; on distilled spirits, $5 per gallon. Such duties shall be in lieu of the duties prescribed under existing law; and the provisions of existing law (including penalties) shall apply to the assessment and collection of such duties.

(b) The amount of duties collected under the provisions of subsection (a) shall be credited to the amount due on such national indebtedness to the United States of such foreign country and shall be considered payment on account of such indebtedness by such country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist on that amendment, because it will merely prolong the discussion to, perhaps, a considerable extent. I am very anxious to get this bill acted on by the Senate and sent over to the House this afternoon so that the House may concur in the amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to debate the amendment; it speaks for itself. It is directed to this proposition, that the principal nations of the world which are in default to us are looking to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to lead them out of the depression, and at the same time they are thumbing their noses at us on the debts they owe us. This amendment is for the purpose of penalizing the nations that are acting as deadbeats in the world.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I am in entire sympathy with what the Senator from Missouri seeks to accomplish, but I have never read the amendment; I have only heard it as the clerk has read it, and, as I caught it from that reading, it seems to me there are some portions of it that ought to be stricken out. It ought to stop, as I view it, at the levy of the extra tax. There is some provision in the amendment about a credit that is to be given on the debts. That provision ought to be stricken out, I think.

Mr. CLARK. I am inclined to think the Senator is correct about that, and I am perfectly willing to withdraw that portion of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, let it be read again with those words out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out of the amendment paragraph (b), as follows:

The amount of duties collected under the provisions of subsection (a) shall be credited to the amount due on such national indebtedness to the United States of such foreign country and shall be considered payment on account of such indebtedness by such country.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment read as it will read with subsection (b) stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 13. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all wines and distilled spirits when imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam), or when withdrawn from bond for consumption or use, if such wines or distilled spirits are exported directly or indirectly from any foreign country which is in default on its national indebtedness to the United States incurred in connection with the World War, the following duties, respectively: On wines, $3 per gallon; on distilled spirits, $5 per gallon. Such duties shall be in addition to the duties prescribed under existing law; and the provisions of existing law (including penalties) shall apply to the assessment and collection of such duties.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of somebody who knows, what are the duties under the existing law?

Mr. HARRISON. The present tariff rate is $5 per gallon.

Mr. WALSH. I thought a different scale of duties applied to wines and distilled spirits.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. WALSH. What are the duties on wines?

Mr. HARRISON. The duty on champagne is $6 a gallon.

Mr. WALSH. Is the result, then, going to be simply to penalize the American people who consume these wines and liquors, or is the amendment really going to be effective in calling the attention of the authorities of foreign countries to the fact that we want our debts paid? It seems to me that we ought not to penalize our own people who want to drink imported liquors. Is it merely an extra tax, or will it be effective in awakening the conscience of the responsible leaders of foreign countries that owe us debts? This business of retaliatory or punitive tariff duties is dangerous. It can lead to most serious consequences and become more harmful to the country imposing than to the country that it is sought to punish. Such action ought to be taken after careful study of all aspects of the issue.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will permit me, it was my thought in proposing such a tax as this that it would awaken the self-interest of the debtor European nations to the fact that the United States is thoroughly in earnest in wanting paid the debts due it. I think it is a sufficiently large tax, while not being prohibitive, to bring about that result.

Mr. WALSH. That was the reason for my inquiry as to what the existing tax is. Can we not have some schedule of taxes submitted to us so that we will know what we are voting on, and not suddenly and quickly put an extra tax on without knowing what the present tax is?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the question presented by the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri was considered in the House when the bill before us was under discussion, and a similar motion was rejected. My recollection is that the Committee on Ways and Means, in preparing the bill, also considered and rejected the proposition. It seems to me that this is an inopportune time to deal with the foreign debt question. It is quite likely Congress will consider before adjournment the question of the indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States. There are many angles to this question and important problems that will be encountered in its determination.

The American people are eager to find markets for their surplus products. Recently loans were made to China to enable her to buy American wheat and cotton, and suggestions are being made from time to time by representatives of agriculture that plans be evolved and put into operation that will result in finding markets for surplus agricultural commodities. We know that our manufacturers and industrialists are seeking outlets for their products. In every part of our land we hear statements to the effect that there has been overproduction, that warehouses and mills and elevators are overflowing with the products of field and farm and mill and factory, and that foreign markets must be secured for these enormous surpluses.

The administration, as we know, is desirous of finding foreign markets for the sale of American products. Every rational person knows that trade and commerce are indispensable to the welfare and prosperity of individuals and nations.

Reactionary policies have been impediments to international commercial transactions. A few years ago our exports amounted to from six to eight billions of dollars. They have diminished until for the year 1932 they were approximately $1,600,000,000, and the balance of trade in favor of the United States was but three hundred million.

I might add that for the same year we imported from France commodities of the value of $44,736,000 and sold to France commodities of the value of more than $111,561,000; and during the current year our exports to France have been very much larger than our imports. It is obvious that, if the amendment pending becomes law, it will provoke retalitory measures and our exports to France will be materially diminished, if not absolutely interdicted, which will result in material injury to our industrialists as well as our agriculturists, who are finding markets in France for some of their surplus products.

Canada has been our best market. Great Britain has been second on the list, and France has been one of the largest purchasers of American commodities. We are profiting more than is France by the commercial relations between the two countries. Any course that will cut off our trade with France will injure her less than it will the United States. It is true France, as well as other countries, have failed to meet their payments to our Government; they have defaulted in their obligations to us, and this situation calls for earnest, calm, and judicial consideration. We cannot, it seems to me, in a sort of cavalier way meet this important question.

There has been no serious and intensive examination of the broad questions involved. There is no report, so far as I am advised, resulting from a comprehensive study of all of the questions involved, together with the implications that will inevitably arise therefrom. This debt question has broader implications than arise from the adoption of the amendment under consideration. As indicated, the failure of governments to meet their obligations to our Government may well warrant a thorough examination and a comprehensive study, with a view to formulating a policy and a line of procedure adequate to meet the situation. The adoption of the amendment before us is attacking a problem in a piecemeal way and not in a broad and comprehensive manner.

Senators should, in considering this matter, keep in mind the fact that under the regulations now in force all wines and liquors imported are placed under quotas. I am not clear as to the authority of the organization with which Mr. Choate is connected to modify quotas after they are promulgated. It may be that if it is desired to punish France, authority now exists to restrict imports of wines and liquors from France.

At any rate, this debt problem is one which may not be disposed of by the motion of the Senator, and I repeat when I declare that there are so many angles to be considered, and so many ramifications affecting the question, that it would be unwise, in my opinion, to adopt the amendment referred to.

The senior Senator from California has a measure pending which will be considered within the next day or two which, directly or indirectly, deals with the question of foreign debts. Under the circumstances, I venture to suggest that it is the part of wisdom to follow the action of the House when a similar amendment is offered and vote down the pending amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope very much that the Senator from Missouri will not insist on a vote on this amendment. It is a question that was not considered by the Finance Committee. Whenever we get into a discussion on the foreign debt default it arouses the passions and the prejudices of Senators, and I include myself because I have no sympathy with some of those nations that are not trying to make some effort at least to pay something upon their debts. But here we are bent upon trying to pass a domestic measure that will increase taxes on a particular product that will be helpful to our own country. This amendment, if adopted here expressing the sense of the Senate, is likely to tie up the matter indefinitely. Such a step should be taken most carefully and after mature deliberation and consideration. The amendment should be drawn with care and should be debated for a considerable time, because every Senator would want to express himself upon it. I hope, Mr. President, that it may not be insisted upon at this time. I should vote against the amendment even though I am in entire sympathy with its purposes.

Some of the foreign countries have paid part upon their debt. The amendment touches them all, regardless of that fact. I have more sympathy with England than I have with France because England has done much more than has France, and yet the amendment would impose the same penalty upon one defaulting nation as on the other. The only nation that would be excepted would be Finland, to which the President called attention the other day.

If the Senate should act now on this matter, perhaps influenced by a belief this is not the psychological time or that it is inopportune and that such a provision should not be incorporated in a bill such as the one now pending before us, and if we should vote it down by 3 or 4 to 1, it would be heralded in the press of foreign countries that such was the sober expression of the Senate of the United States. I do not want that impression to go out. I would rather have it be reported that the Senate unanimously adheres to the position it has already taken and expressed in other resolutions passed to the effect that we want these debts paid.

I have no doubt that the matter ought not to be pressed at this time and put upon this bill; first, because it will not carry with it a full and frank expression of just what the Senate may think; and second, because it is likely to cause a delay in the final enactment of this imperative legislation for liquor taxation.

Then, too, it is no secret that President Roosevelt has been considering the question of submitting a message to the Congress on reciprocal trade or marketing agreements. In those agreements the President would take into consideration whether a defaulting nation had made part payment or not, so that it would be unnecessary to write it into other legislation. It ought not to be written into such legislation as this. Diplomats do not act in that way. The Senate has expressed itself about the debt question. It has expressed itself unanimously against cancelation of the debts in the moratorium resolution which we adopted. Let us not clog the wheels here in connection with this legislation which we want to expedite so the Government may receive the tax money involved.

When the reciprocal trade legislation comes here it would be a more appropriate time, if the Senator from Missouri wanted to offer his amendment, for the Senate then to consider it. If we have confidence in those carrying on the diplomatic relations of the country and those who are administering the Government, then such matters as this should be left to them to consider instead of writing them into law and saying they must do this and must do that. Let us not at this particular time slap somebody in the face. Let us not try to clog and disarrange some of our diplomatic relationships, because it is unnecessary in the writing of a tax bill relating to liquor. I hope the distinguished Senator from Missouri will not insist upon his amendment under the circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to a line in the address of the President on the convening of Congress:

> I expect to report to you later in regard to debts owed the Government and the people of this country by the governments and peoples of other countries.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment, it neither settles one question nor another in respect to the foreign debts, but it deals with the very subject matter of the bill that is now under consideration. We have before us a bill providing a tax upon liquors. The amendment increases the tax upon imported liquors. It does it, it is true, as against defaulting nations in their payments to the United States upon the indebtedness now existing, but for the love of heaven is there any reason why the United States, or the Congress, dealing with a taxation measure, should not penalize in favor of its own people those nations which decline to honor their obligations to us. Dealing with the amount of money that is to be realized from liquor, dealing with those particular countries that have defaulted in their payments to us, is there any reason why we should not tax their liquors at a higher rate than we tax our own? That is all that is presented by the amendment except, of course, the use of the interdicted words, "the defaulting nation in payment of debts to the United States."

If that is all there is to the amendment, there is not, in my opinion, any reason why it should not be adopted. It will aid Americans. It will aid wine men throughout this Nation. It will add to the revenue collected from liquor in this country under this bill, and there is no reason that I can fathom why that should not happen.

I cannot answer any of the inquiries that have been propounded in respect to reciprocal trade relations. On the 27th of December, after reading in the press that there has been some relationship established between a quota upon wines in France and the delivery of some apples from the United States to France, I addressed a communication, which I trust was wholly courteous in character, to Mr. Livesey of the Senate Department, who is advertised as the gentleman who has made the arrangements with France, asking what it was and asking as well for information upon the quotas that had been established by France in relation to American goods.

Of course, that communication was delivered during the holiday season, I concede, and equally of course I concede that from the 27th day of December until the 9th or 10th day of January would not afford ample opportunity for a distinguished member of the State Department to reply to a courteous query addressed by a Member of the United States Senate. So I have not at hand the exact information that I sought at that time, and perhaps I may never have it, for I have had some dealings in the past with distinguished gentlemen in my search for knowledge that might enable me to legislate accurately, and my experience at least has aroused within me a skepticism that perhaps I may never obtain officially that which I thus seek.

But, sir, there is another aspect to this as well. It may be the question should not have arisen in this particular manner. I doubt that, however, for I think it a perfectly proper amendment. When confronted with an amendment of this sort which expresses the opinion of the Senate concerning the debts that are due and which puts upon those defaulting nations at least the penalty of paying a higher tax upon that which we are making ourselves, there is no reason of the slightest character why that should not be undertaken.

I have a bill upon the calendar which possibly may be reached this afternoon—if not, when the next call of the calendar is made—the design of which is to have the Congress of the United States upon record so that there can be no mistake respecting it. It prohibits, in the future, the sale or the dealing in foreign securities of various countries which have defaulted in their indebtedness to us.

I cannot assume, sir, that there will be any objection to a measure of that sort. It ought to be passed, and it ought to be passed instanter; but I see no objection to an additional tax to those nations which have defaulted, and I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment be stated again. I have been trying to get it in order to read it but have been unable to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 13. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all wines and distilled spirits when imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam), or when withdrawn from bond for consumption or use, if such wines or distilled spirits are exported directly or indirectly from any foreign country which is in default on its national indebtedness to the United States incurred in connection with the World War, the following duties, respectively: On wines, $3 per gallon; on distilled spirits, $5 per gallon. Such duties shall be in addition to the duties prescribed under existing law; and the provisions of existing law (including penalties) shall apply to the assessment and collection of such duties.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the author of the amendment? Where reference is made to "existing law", ought it not to be "this act"? Are those duties prescribed in this act?

Mr. CLARK. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I am informed that it does not impose those duties.

Mr. CLARK. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it seems to me the amendment is all right as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Hebert	Reynolds
Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Davis	King	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	La Follette	Schall
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lewis	Sheppard
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith
Bone	Erickson	McAdoo	Steiwer
Borah	Fess	McGill	Stephens
Brown	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkley	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	George	Murphy	Thompson
Byrd	Glass	Neely	Trammell
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Norris	Tydings
Capper	Gore	Nye	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hale	O'Mahoney	Van Nuys
Carey	Harrison	Overton	Walsh
Clark	Hastings	Patterson	Wheeler
Connally	Hatch	Pittman
Coolidge	Hayden	Pope

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] are detained in an important committee meeting of the Senate.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] are detained from the Senate on important departmental business.

Mr. OVERTON. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think there is much merit in what the Senator from Arizona has said. On the other hand, there ought never to be any misunderstanding as to the sentiment of the people of this country, and, I believe, of the Members of this body, on what our attitude should be toward a country which does not even make an attempt to pay a debt that it has not only recognized, but recognized by an agreement under which we have agreed to cancel the entire principal of the debt if the country will but pay a rate of interest upon that principal.

I think it is unfortunate that the amendment should be presented at this time; but, since it is presented, it seems to me that, from my viewpoint, there is only one thing I can do, and that is to express my views by voting for the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire whether the amendment was submitted to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. HARRISON. It was not submitted to the Committee on Finance. The committee gave it no consideration at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator wishes to be accurate. If my recollection serves me correctly, the Senator from Missouri desired to offer the amendment in the committee, but the Senator from Mississippi asked him to offer it instead on the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. My recollection is that that was an amendment with reference to advertisements going out of wet States into dry States. I recall nothing in the world with reference to this amendment coming up in the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator may be right about that.

Mr. CLARK. That statement is correct. I did not offer the amendment in the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say further to the Senator from Arkansas that so anxious were we to divorce these other controversial matters from this legislation and speed this bill along that we left out the tariff question. We considered first incorporating in the bill the reciprocal trade-agreement authority to the President, but we wanted to eliminate possibilities of controversy, and for that reason we left it out of the bill.

I hope very much that this question will not become involved in the pending legislation; and while I am in sympathy with everything the Senator from Missouri is proposing, this is just not the proper place for the amendment to go on; I hope, therefore, it will be rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment involves not only the imposition of duties which will provoke, as has already been announced by one Senator, tariff issues in the Senate which would be difficult to determine and probably invite retaliatory tariff action by some foreign governments, but it also involves questions of policy to which little consideration has been given except by those Senators who have been fortunate enough to have the opportunity of studying them.

I do not believe this amendment ought to be incorporated in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on the pending measure, because I am anxious to expedite it, just as is every other Senator; but those who desire to defeat the pending amendment have urged various objections to it which seem to me to be unwarranted.

What is this amendment which everybody favors but nobody wants? We are told that the Senate is for it, and that the country is for it, but that we are not to vote for it. We are told that it was not offered in the committee. If it be true that that is an objection sufficient to warrant the defeat of the amendment, then it must follow that whenever any legislation is proposed here in the future it must be passed as the committee reports it, without opportunity to offer amendments in the Senate.

I concede, to begin with, that it would have been better if this matter had been handled in the committee, if they had had an opportunity to frame the amendment; but the committee did not do that.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to say, on that point, that when the bill was reported on Monday the committee had had it under consideration in the afternoon, the Senate was being held in session, and it was deemed very important that the bill be brought in. I had previously announced that I intended to offer this amendment, but I did not see any necessity to delay reporting the bill by presenting the amendment in the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the amount of the foreign debt has been settled, has been determined, has been agreed upon by the Government of the United States and the foreign nations.

It seems to me that the idea of hereafter considering the debts should not be entertained. We have had the question of the debts before us, we have debated it at length; and against the ideas of some of us who believe that the debts were fairly and honestly incurred and ought to be paid in full we have seen agreements approved between our Government and other governments by which nearly the whole of the debt was forgiven, and now no payments are made on the settlements agreed to.

As I understand it, the proposed amendment would apply to the nations which are in default. There has been no claim, so far as I know, that any of these agreements were made under duress, or were unfair. In round numbers we have forgiven about half the debts, and our taxpayers today are paying the debts of Europe. They are really repaying the money which the European nations borrowed from our Government.

Mr. President, the debtor nations asked for the money they received; we did not force it upon them. When we came to settle, generously we took off one half of the debt, and our people have to pay the other half, and are paying it now. In these times of depression this taxation, which has been placed upon the shoulders of the American people, has been increased, and will continually be increased, by the amount of money which we forgave from debts which were fairly and honestly incurred.

Now we are confronted with a proposal to levy a tax on spirituous liquors imported from those countries greater than that levied on liquor from other governments. Those governments could get rid of that tax by paying what they owed. They are not required to pay all the debts; they are required to pay only according to the very agreements which these different governments have made and have sanctioned.

There would be no injustice in this. I do not suppose there would be this result, but suppose it did result in some of these governments not shipping us any whisky. The American people are bright. If they will just be patient, the American people will make their own champagne and make their own wine. Why this clamor that we must look after liquor first before we take up any other tariff problem?

Copper has been mentioned, and as far as that is concerned, the problem is not a difficult one to solve. If the Senator from Arizona will offer his amendment, for one, I will vote for it. But the effort is to have this apply particularly to liquor, which we can get along without, and which we can produce ourselves, and get drunk on liquor we manufacture ourselves. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is necessarily absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and vote "nay." I am not advised as to how the Senator from Alabama would vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is absent. I do not know how that Senator would vote if he were present. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily absent: Mr. GIBSON, Mr. METCALF, Mr. NORBECK, Mr. WALCOTT, Mr. WHITE, Mr. KEAN, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. REED.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] has a pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. I am not advised how either of these Senators would vote if present and voting.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] is necessarily detained. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I am not advised how he would vote on this question and therefore transfer my pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and let my vote stand.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] are detained in an important committee meeting and are therefore unable to be present on this vote.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent on departmental business for their constituents.

Mr. OVERTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. LONG].

The vote was recapitulated by the legislative clerk.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas are 40, the nays are 39, so the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was on my feet seeking recognition to ask for a recapitulation of the vote, it was so close.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will again recapitulate the vote.

The vote was recapitulated.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—40

Bachman	Copeland	Hastings	Nye

So Mr. CLARK's amendment was agreed to, as follows:

On page 8, after line 17, insert the following:

"SEC. 13. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all wines and distilled spirits when imported into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam), or when withdrawn from bond for consumption or use, if such wines or distilled spirits are exported directly or indirectly from any foreign country which is in default on its national indebtedness to the United States incurred in connection with the World War, the following duties, respectively:

"On wines, $3 per gallon; on distilled spirits, $5 per gallon. Such duties shall be in addition to the duties prescribed under existing law, and the provisions of existing law (including penalties) shall apply to the assessment and collection of such duties."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to page 5, the second paragraph.

The matter involved here is the question of the tax on artificially carbonated wines. A little while ago I made an appeal to the Senate that, in the interest of temperance and agriculture, there should be a lower tax upon light wine of an alcoholic content under 14 percent. I seemed to have no support from Senators from grape-growing States. Therefore I did not press the matter. I mention it now, however, because there is a larger group of Senators present.

It certainly seems to me that in every State where grapes are grown commercially there should be an interest in lowering the tax on this particular type of wine. If we are hoping to promote temperance, we want to make light wine as cheap as possible. If we are interested in agriculture, we want to help the grape grower. Every time a cent of tax is put on this light wine it means that a tax of $2 per ton is placed on grapes. A tax of 10 cents per gallon on light wine represents a tax of $20 per ton on grapes. It seems to me that every Senator from a grape-growing State ought to be interested in expressing some sentiment regarding this particular item.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I interrupt the Senator from New York because he made the statement that those from grape-growing States ought to be interested in this item. I am interested. I have been so intensely interested in the matter that I have been canvassing the situation to see whether or not there could be a reduction in the tax upon wines of no higher degree of alcoholic content than 14 percent; but I met with so little acquiescence that I thought it was probably an impossible thing to attempt, so I have not attempted it.

The Senator from New York is entirely right in what he is saying. The tax, of course, falls heavily upon agriculture, because wine-growing in vineyards is agriculture. Whisky can be watered, as the distillers are doing. The distillers can take 1 quart of whisky and make out of it 5 or 6 quarts of rotten, rotgut whisky, as they are doing today; and there is not anything that will prevent them from doing it, and there is not anything that will diminish the profits they make.

You cannot put water, however, into wine, except when you make vinegar. That is the difference between the ability to adulterate the one and the inability to adulterate the other.

I am wholly in sympathy with the Senator's position, and I do not want his remarks to pass unnoticed because nothing has been done in that regard. The Senator may be aware that my colleague [Mr. McADOO] made an effort to get the reduction in the Finance Committee, and he was defeated by a vote of 11 to 7. Part of that vote possibly would not be with him if the same attempt were made upon the floor. It seemed a hopeless task to endeavor to reduce the tax rate on light wine to what we thought would be the comparative rate of tax, and for that reason I have not offered any amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from California, but I still think that if the Senate understood what this means it would take action along the lines I suggest. If the contribution to the Government were a large sum, we would say, "Yes; we are glad to do this"; but the extreme amount of revenue to be derived as suggested by the Senator in charge of the bill is $7,000,000. My own figures indicate $5,000,000; but if the tax were placed at 5 cents the Government would get half as much, anyway, and there would be a direct aid to agriculture in every grape-growing State in America. I was hoping that the Senator from Mississippi would be willing, since the bill must go to conference, to accept a lower rate, say, 5 cents a gallon, and then discuss it once more in the conference committee and see if there could not be a reduction in the tax upon wine of this character, because certainly it means much to agriculture; it means much to my State and to the State so ably represented by both Senators from California. There are, however, other States in the Union, which are likewise interested, and my surprise has been that I have not had the enthusiastic support from different parts of the Union in the effort to do what seems to me to be so obviously our duty.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. How many gallons of wine will a ton of grapes produce?

Mr. COPELAND. It takes about from 13 to 16 pounds of grapes to make a gallon of wine.

Mr. BARKLEY. Thirteen pounds?

Mr. COPELAND. From 13 pounds to 16 pounds.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, 5 quarts, I understand, are obtained from a gallon of wine; so that a tax of 10 cents a gallon as provided in the bill will result in a 2-cent tax on each quart bottle of wine that is consumed. Does the Senator think that 2 cents a bottle is an exorbitant rate?

Mr. COPELAND. It does not sound that way, but it does mean, in the aggregate, if the tax upon 14-percent wine is made 10 cents a gallon, a tax of from fifteen to seventeen and one half dollars on a ton of grapes.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is because a ton of grapes produces such a large number of gallons of wine. I do not suppose it is a vital matter so far as the Treasury is concerned; but, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from California, who drew a comparison between wine and adulterated whisky or distilled spirits, let me say that in this bill there is a difference between 10 cents a gallon on wine and $2 a gallon on distilled spirits, so that there is not exactly a parallel. The consumer will never know any difference, so far as the cost of a bottle of wine is concerned, whether the tax is 5 cents or 10 cents a gallon.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree to that; but the producer will.

Mr. BARKLEY. I doubt that, because I think, in all probability, that the tax will be passed on. It does not attach until after it leaves the producer of the grape, and it will attach then, if it attaches at all, to the producer, only to the extent of 2 cents a bottle on a quart of wine, or it will be absorbed by those who produce the wine, who are not the grape growers according to my understanding.

Mr. COPELAND. But, Mr. President, there is not any doubt at all that the producer will pay a tax of from $15 to $20 a ton as a consequence of the passage of this bill as it now stands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, cannot the same argument be made as to two other agricultural products, namely, corn and barley, used in distilled spirits and beer? Can it not be claimed that the consumers are taxed and that there is a burden placed upon agriculture when the tax upon a bushel of barley, which makes a barrel of beer, is $5, and the tax on a bushel of corn is $9 when converted into the 4½ gallons of whisky produced from corn?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not quite see the force of that argument as applied here. The Senator from California has well stated it. So far as the consumer is concerned, he is going to get in the case of whisky—I hate to use the term, on account of the galleries—a concoction that, in my opinion, is scandalous.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am interested to know what is the price of a ton of grapes out of which wine is made and on which the Senator says there will be imposed a tax of $20 a ton. What is the price of a ton of grapes?

Mr. COPELAND. It depends upon the market. It would run from twenty to twenty-five, thirty-five, or forty dollars a ton.

Mr. BARKLEY. Sold by the ton or by the pound?

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps I misspoke myself. It would run from thirty to thirty-five or forty dollars a ton, and under this bill the tax will come out of the producer of grapes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it is true that a ton of grapes made into wine brings only thirty to thirty-five dollars a ton, and if the tax of 2 cents a bottle would reflect upon the producer of grapes to the extent of $20 a ton, it would seem that somebody between the consumer and the grower is making an enormous profit by the manufacture and sale of wines, because $20 a ton, which the Senator says would be the tax on the grapes, amounts to a tax of 2 cents a bottle on wine.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from California has described the reason for that. When whisky is made nobody gets any pure whisky. The sort of stuff that is sold in the drug stores as whisky is little short of a scandal. The sort of medicinal liquor that is sold is cut and recut; it is brightened up with coloring matter; it contains a lot of sherry; it contains a tremendous amount of grain alcohol; and by the time it gets to the consumer it contains water. He does not get any whisky in the sense that the Pharmacopœia has described whisky. Likewise, in the making of beer, 90 percent of the beer is water; but when it comes to wine it is all grape juice; there is not any way to impose upon the public or to exploit the public. If the Members of the Senate who believe in temperance and are distressed over the idea of what may happen when we have free and unlimited sale of whisky wish to promote the cause of temperance, they will be for a lower rate on light wines. Furthermore, if they are interested in agriculture, they will want to help the grape grower. It was on this account that I rose, because a little while ago I was convinced that there is no sentiment in the Senate in favor of a proposal for the reduction of the tax on light wines.

I wish, however, to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question about a provision on page 5. The first paragraph reads that there shall be levied—

On each bottle or other container of champagne or sparkling wine, 5 cents on each one-half pint or fraction thereof.

Then, in the next paragraph, it is provided that there shall be levied—

On each bottle or other container of artificially carbonated wine, 2½ cents on each one-half pint or fraction thereof.

Wine artificially carbonated is regarded often by the consumer as a champagne, as a sparkling wine, and the consumer gets no benefit. It is sold at the same price as is natural sparkling wine, and why should it not be taxed at the same rate? So, at the same time, I am asking for a reduction of the tax on light natural wine; I am asking why there should not be a higher tax on artificially carbonated wine.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that I can give the Senator the reason why artificially carbonated wine is not taxed higher than the other variety, but the law has always distinguished between champagne and sparkling wine. The old law, under the champagne and sparkling-wine provision, provided a rate of 12 cents on each half pint. We make it 5 cents. On each bottle of artificially carbonated wine we make it 2½ where it used to be 6 cents. We reduced both those rates. I do not know that I can give to the Senator the reasons why artificially carbonated wine should not bear a higher rate than the other, but it has never done so, and those who have studied the question have said it should not be so. I suppose that is the reason why we adopted the rate provided.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be world without end.

Of course, we are living in a time when we are setting aside old-time theories and practices, and now would be a good time to make the change. I think that artificially carbonated wine ought to be taxed at the same rate as natural sparkling wine. That is my judgment.

I am not going to press either one of these matters, because we seem inclined in the matter of rates to follow the committee, but I do think that Senators from other grape-growing States should be sufficiently interested to give some moral support to the suggestions which I have made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYDEN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not care to prolong the discussion, but just as a matter of interest, I have been calculating what the net result of this tax will be.

Mr. COPELAND. That is on artificially carbonated wine?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am referring to the wine tax. Two thousand pounds of grapes, representing a ton, will produce 155 gallons of wine. At 10 cents a gallon, the tax on this product of a ton of grapes is $15.50. That 155 gallons of grape wine, though, to the consumer, brings $1,245.

Mr. COPELAND. At what price is that?

Mr. BARKLEY. At an average of $1.50 a quart it would be $7.50 to the wine gallon.

Mr. COPELAND. One dollar and fifty cents a quart for natural light wine?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a fair average according to a statement made to the Finance Committee a few days ago. Some of it sells for less and some for considerably more.

Mr. COPELAND. My own familiarity with wine cards, reading them as a matter of scholarly interest, would indicate to me that light American wines would never sell for $1.50 a quart.

Mr. BARKLEY. My recollection is that it was stated to the committee a few days ago that $1.50 is a fair average retail price for these wines. Frankly, I do not know from personal knowledge what the charge is for this particular type of wine; but even if we might assume that to be a dollar instead of $1.50, the price paid by the consumer for these wines is much larger than at first blush might be considered as the financial result of the growth of a ton of grapes. It seems to me this tax of $15.50 upon the result of the fermentation of wine is so insignificant that a reduction to 5 or 7½ cents would never be felt by the consumer and could not be reflected upon the grower in any serious way.

Mr. COPELAND. I know how sincere my friend is. I know what his attitude has been toward intemperance. We have now, with the repeal of prohibition, a new set of conditions in the United States. I think everybody that has given it any thought realizes that unless common sense shall be exercised by those who deal in this traffic there will be a renewed sentiment for further legislation. Unquestionably there will be an effort made to promote temperance by an urgent appeal to the people to drink light wines. In my opinion, there ought to be such an appeal. If I know anything about the human body and the effect of alcohol upon it, I would say that if one must take alcoholic liquor of any sort, he is far wiser and more likely to protect his health and prolong his life if he takes light wine. From my standpoint, I would say that we ought in every way possible to encourage the drinking of light wines and to that end make their price as low as possible.

I know as well as I can know without being an expert on the subject that the tax on light wine will be reflected upon the producer of grapes. If the rate is fixed at 10 cents a gallon it will mean a tax upon the grower of grapes of from $15 to $18 per ton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments? There being no further amendments the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, ask for a conference with the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be named by the Presiding Officer.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. REED, and Mr. COUZENS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill just passed may be printed with the amendments adopted by the Senate numbered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. DICKINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, may I say that I promised the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that when the bill was passed I would suggest the absence of a quorum. Will the Senator yield to me for that purpose at this time?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Carey	Glass	McCarran
Ashurst	Clark	Goldsborough	McGill
Austin	Connally	Gore	McKellar
Bachman	Coolidge	Hale	McNary

Mr. OVERTON. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY (S.DOC. NO. 110)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Senate:

I request the consideration of ratification by the Senate of the so-called "St. Lawrence Treaty with Canada." Broad national reasons lead me, without hesitation, to advocate the treaty. There are two main considerations—navigation and power.

Canada and the United States are possessed of a natural flow of water from near the center of the continent to the ocean—a flow which throughout the greater part of its length is today available for navigation by large-size vessels. A system of locks at the eastern end of Lake Superior, a dredged channel between Lake Huron and Lake Erie, and another series of great locks between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario provide free and adequate navigation to a point well down the St. Lawrence River. From there a series of three rapids, all of them within a distance of 120 miles, now impede navigation by ocean-going vessels; but a Canadian canal already provides facilities for smaller ships. This Canadian canal now is used substantially up to its capacity.

Two of the three rapids are wholly in Canadian territory, the other is in the so-called "international section." A great power development at the Beauharnois Rapids in Canada is already nearing completion, and locks for ocean-going ships have been planned for and could readily be built at a low cost as part of the plan. This means that only two additional series of locks are required for a complete and continuous seaway from Duluth to salt water. I call your attention to the simple fact that Canada alone can, if desired, build locks at the Lachine Rapids and at the international sector, and thus provide a seaway wholly within Canadian control without treaty participation by the United States. This, however, would be a reversal of the policy of cooperation which the United States and Canada have continuously maintained for generations.

I want to make it very clear that this great international highway for shipping is without any question going to be completed in the near future, and that this completion should be carried out by both nations instead of by one.

I am sending you herewith a summary of data prepared at my request by governmental agencies. This summary, in its relation to the economic aspects of the seaway, shows from the broad national point of view, first, that commerce and transportation will be greatly benefited and, secondly, local fears of economic harm to special localities or to special interests are grossly exaggerated. It is, I believe, a historic fact that every great improvement directed to better commercial communications, whether in the case of railroads into new territory, or the deepening of great rivers, or the building of canals, or even the cutting of the Isthmus of Panama, have all been subjected to opposition on the part of local interests which conjure up imaginary fears and fail to realize that improved transportation results in increased commerce benefiting directly or indirectly all sections.

For example, I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway will not injure the railroads or throw their employees out of work; that it will not in any way interfere with the proper use of the Mississippi River or the Missouri River for navigation. Let us be wholly frank in saying that it is better economics to send grain or other raw materials from our Northwest to Europe via the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence than it is to send them around three sides of a square—via Texas ports or the Mississippi, thence through the Gulf of Mexico, and thence from the southern end of the North Atlantic to its northern end. In this illustration, it is well to remember that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points.

I am satisfied that the treaty contains adequate provision for the needs of the Chicago Drainage District and for navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River. A special report from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department covers this subject.

On the affirmative side, I subscribe to the definite belief that the completion of the seaway will greatly serve the economic and transportation needs of a vast area of the United States and should, therefore, be considered solely from the national point of view.

The other great objective provided for in the treaty relates to the development of electric power. As you know, I have advocated the development of four great power areas in the United States, each to serve as a yardstick and each to be controlled by Government or governmental agencies. The Tennessee Valley plants and projects in the Southeast, the Boulder Dam on the Colorado River in the Southwest, the Columbia River projects in the Northwest are already under construction. The St. Lawrence development in the Northeast calls for action. This river is a source of incomparably cheap power located in proximity to a great industrial and rural market and within transmission distance of millions of domestic consumers.

The Legislature of the State of New York, by unanimous vote, set up the necessary State machinery during my term as Governor of New York, and the State stands ready to cooperate with the Federal Government in the distribution of power in accordance with what I believe is today a definite national policy.

Power in the international sector of the St. Lawrence cannot be developed without a treaty between the United States and Canada. On the other hand, Canada can develop a huge block of new power at the two other rapids, which lie wholly within Canadian territory. Here again, as in the case of navigation, it is better in every way that we should maintain the historic principle of accord with Canada in the mutual development of the two Nations.

I have not stressed the fact that the starting of this great work will put thousands of unemployed to work. I have preferred to stress the great future advantages to our country, and especially the fact that all of us should view this treaty in the light of the benefits which it confers on the people of the United States as a whole.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the message, together with the accompanying data and illustrations, lie on the table and be printed as a Senate document for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DICKINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

There was an agreement to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar for Unobjected Bills at the conclusion of the consideration of the liquor-tax bill. I presume that order may be renewed tomorrow, if it is desired, and the Senator may go on with his address. I understand his address will consume perhaps the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. DICKINSON. Not over 30 minutes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to state to the Senator from Arkansas that I asked for that consent, which he so readily granted, on account of the request made to me by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence I should not want to alter the agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will allow me to propound an interrogatory to the Senator from Arkansas as leader?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I address myself to the Senator from Arkansas and ask if there is any arrangement or suggestion of any immediate vote touching the question of the treaty that has just been presented in the message of the President?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not expect any action to be taken on the treaty this afternoon.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, the latter part of the Budget message of the President of the United States the other day contained an assurance to the country that the emergency expenditures in the various new bureaus of the Government were to be audited by the Budget Director and by the Comptroller. I think it was an assurance that we were at least to see where the money was going, regardless of whether we got value received or not.

I desire to read from that message, as printed under date of January 4, on page 32 of the RECORD.

The President stated:

> Up to now there has been no coordinated control over emergency expenditures. Today, by Executive order, I have imposed that necessary control in the Bureau of the Budget.
> Heretofore, emergency expenditures have not been subject to audit by the Comptroller General of the General Accounting Office. Today I am, by Executive order, reposing in him the authority to conduct such an audit and to continue to audit each such expenditure. Hereafter, therefore, just as in the departmental expenditures, there will be, in emergency expenditures, a pre-Budget and a post audit.
> By reason of the fact that the Bureau of the Budget has had no control in the past over the various expenditures, obligations, and allotments made by the emergency organizations, the task of preparing the present Budget has been the most difficult one since the Budget and Accounting Act went into effect in 1921. These difficulties, in future years, will be substantially minimized by the control which I have established.

Mr. President, very much to the surprise of everyone, that order remained in effect 72 hours and was then supplanted by an order in terms like those of the resolution I presented here this morning, under which none of these accounts are to be audited by the Budget, under which there is simply to be a report from each one of these emergency bureaus to the Budget Director.

My resolution, to which these remarks will be addressed, asks that these emergency bureaus, administrations, and so forth, forward to the Secretary of the Senate exact copies of the data filed with the Budget Director. Of course, the only result of compliance would be that we would get information, but with the information we would at least have some idea as to where the money under these emergency expenditures is going.

I think that in order that the Senate may understand the full effect of this order I will read from Arthur Krock's article in the New York Times of January 8:

> Efforts are being made, and will be made, to minimize the cause and effect of the President's substitution of a new Executive order today for that of January 3, which gave to Budget Director Douglas the power to audit the emergency Budget. But the plain fact is that those in the administration who are committed to the policy of spending for recovery without check banded themselves together and persuaded the President to change his prudent plan.
> Mr. Douglas' audit powers lasted about 3 days. They were suggested by Treasury officials, who are peculiarly aware of the fact that before a government can have a financing policy it must have a fiscal policy. The way to have a fiscal policy is to lodge a certain amount of supervision over emergency expenditures in the hands of an official. To the Treasury heads and to the President Mr. Douglas seemed precisely that official.
> The terms of the first Executive order became known to the spending group last Friday morning. Secretary Ickes, Administrator Hopkins, and Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Tugwell were in no doubt as to its force and meaning. The order was as tight as Mr. Douglas, whom the President had asked to draw it, could make it. But accompanying the order were "waiver" forms which permitted responsible officials safely to contract necessary emergency obligation, growing out of fixed policy, and guaranteed commitments they might have made before the issuance of the Executive order.

Strange as it may seem, after these visits to the White House, the President canceled the former order, which lasted, as I have said, but 72 hours, and made a new Executive order. This is a description by Mr. Krock of the new Executive order:

> The new Executive order directs all agencies of the Government to submit weekly itemized reports of all emergency expenditures, and weekly reports also of all contracts made. The Director of the Budget is to be furnished with these reports and is authorized to make comment and recommendations thereupon. These comments and recommendations he can send to the President.
> The difference in the two orders is fundamental. With the exception of the detailed weekly reports, unrestricted spending power is back in the hands of those who are committed to spending. They are to be responsible for their spending to the President. But that has always been the case. The only gain in the comedy of the noble 72-hour gesture is that Mr. Douglas and Comptroller General McCarl will know more quickly what horses and how many have been taken from the barn. After the fact they can point out vigorously whether or not they think the horses were taken too fast. The President, obviously responsive to argument—as this whole incident proves—can get a clearer idea of the spending methods of his associates.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AUSTIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. As I understood the Senator's reading, a statement of the expenditure is to be reported back to the Budget Director, but after the expenditure is made?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is it exactly.

Mr. FESS. Why should a report be sent to him after the expenditure is made?

Mr. DICKINSON. I presume simply for comment which he might make to the President, or to someone else to whom he might desire to send the information. We all know that if there is authority to spend, and the only thing the particular bureau has to do is to report it, the chance of having someone make serious objection to an expenditure after it is already made is remote. As a matter of fact, the whole purpose of the original order was to have an audit, to see that the authorization was legal, that it was authorized under the law, before the money passed out of the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. In other words, it was an effort to keep direction in the proper authority over the expenditure of the money?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is exactly true.

Mr. FESS. A thing which I think was applauded all over the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to suggest this to the Senator from Ohio. We can go to many of these emergency organizations now and come away with an authorization of $10,000,000 in a few minutes' time, but if we want a nickel's worth of information, we cannot get it in a month. I have been trying in vain for that length of time to get information from a number of them.

The thing I am trying to set forth here is what was done in the cancelation of this first order. Mr. Krock says further:

> Members of the "brain trust" charge that the Director is out of sympathy with the Surplus Relief Corporation, that mysterious agency with incredibly vast powers organized in Delaware as a private corporation by Mr. Hopkins and Secretaries Ickes and Wallace. If that is true, then he would have held up the proposed expenditure by the Corporation of $50,000,000 to purchase submarginal lands, asking for a statement as to powers, policies, and immediate plans. The fruits of that investigation might have been rich from the viewpoint of the taxpayers and might even have provided news for the President and Congress. Under the new order the Corporation can go ahead with P.W.A. money—and then report that it has been spent!

There is the crux of the whole thing.

This morning I find an editorial in the Washington Post which, I think, sets forth the question I am discussing. It reads:

Withdrawal of the order which gave the Budget Bureau a check on emergency expenditures is a significant victory for those officials who believe in unrestrained spending for recovery purposes. The issue was clearly drawn in President Roosevelt's Budget message. He informed Congress that control over emergency expenditures had been lacking and that he had "imposed that necessary control in the Bureau of the Budget." But the control remained in effect for only 3 days.

President Roosevelt's substitute order is a sharp reversal of the policy announced in his Budget message. Instead of checking the expenditures of the emergency organizations before they are made, the Director of the Budget will merely receive weekly statements showing the allocation of funds and obligations incurred by the P.W.A., C.W.A., etc. If he has any complaint to make, it can be carried to the President—after the money has been spent. In other words, Lewis Douglas may slam the door as vigorously as he pleases as each horse disappears around the corner.

As a matter of fact, we know that an official of the Government will not make any such complaint. As a matter of fact, he will get the information, and he may say that he disapproves of some of it, but in the end he will make no official complaint as to the action which has been taken.

Under any circumstances it would be difficult to justify the expenditure of billions of dollars without the ordinary precautions against waste or loose and illegal spending. The establishment of such checks may have been neglected during the emergency stages of the recovery program in order to avoid delay in the distribution of Government funds. But certainly it cannot now be contended that any new crisis justifies the abandonment of budgetary precautions just 3 days after they were put into effect.

Mr. President, I want to suggest that there are numerous expenditures which, in my judgment, should be carefully scrutinized. In order that we may understand them, I present here the certificate of incorporation of the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, incorporated in the State of Delaware, and in view of the fact that it is not long, I am going to ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the certificate was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION OF FEDERAL SURPLUS RELIEF CORPORATION

First. The name of the Corporation is Federal Surplus Relief Corporation.

Second. The principal office or place of business of this Corporation in the State of Delaware is to be located at No. 100 West Tenth Street, in the city of Wilmington, New Castle County; the name and address of its resident agent is the Corporation Trust Co., No. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Del.

Third. The nature of the business and objects or purposes to be transacted, promoted, or carried on by this Corporation are:

(a) To relieve the existing national economic emergency by expansion of markets for, removal of, and increasing and improving the distribution of agricultural and other commodities and products thereof;

(b) To purchase, store, handle, and process surplus agricultural and other commodities and products thereof, and to dispose of the same so as to relieve the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment and/or to adjust the severe disparity between the prices of agricultural commodities and other commodities and products thereof;

(c) To perform any and all functions and exercise any and all powers that may be duly delegated to it under and pursuant to the following acts of Congress of the United States of America:

1. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved May 12, 1933.

2. Title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933.

3. The Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933, approved May 12, 1933.

(d) To perform any and all functions and exercise any and all powers that may be duly delegated to it under and pursuant to any amendment or amendments heretofore or hereafter made to said acts of Congress or any of them;

(e) To accept grants or deliveries in any of the States, Districts, Territories, or colonies of the United States, or in any and all foreign countries (subject to the laws of such State, District, Territory, colony, or country), of moneys, commodities, lands, or other property, of any class, nature, or description, made to it under and pursuant to said acts of Congress or any amendment or amendments thereto heretofore or hereafter made;

(f) to carry on any or all of its operations and business and without restriction or limit as to amount to purchase or otherwise acquire, hold, own, mortgage, sell, convey, or otherwise dispose of real and personal property of every class, nature, or description in any of the States, Districts, Territories, or colonies of the United States, or in any and all foreign countries, subject to the laws of such State, District, Territory, colony, or country;

(g) to cooperate with any private, public, or governmental agency or agencies; and

(h) in general, to carry on any and all other business necessary or convenient to the attainment of the foregoing objects or purposes, and to have and exercise all the powers and privileges conferred by the general corporation law of Delaware upon corporations not organized for profit and having no capital stock.

(i) The foregoing clauses shall be construed both as objects and powers, and it is hereby expressly provided that the foregoing enumeration of specific powers shall not be held to limit or restrict in any manner the powers of this Corporation.

Fourth. This Corporation is not organized for profit and shall not have authority to issue capital stock. The conditions of membership of this Corporation are that there shall be three members and that such members shall be the persons who from time to time may occupy the offices of Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, and Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, respectively.

Fifth. The names and places of residence of each of the original incorporators of this Corporation are: Henry A. Wallace, Washington, D.C.; Harold L. Ickes, Washington, D.C.; and Harry L. Hopkins, Washington, D.C.

Sixth. This Corporation is to have perpetual existence.

Seventh. The members of this Corporation shall not be subject to the payment of corporate debts to any extent whatever.

Eighth. The business of this Corporation shall be managed by a board of directors which shall not be less than three, consisting of the members of the Corporation. The term of office of each of the directors shall be fixed by the bylaws of the Corporation.

In addition to the powers conferred upon the board of directors by the statutes of the State of Delaware and this certificate of incorporation, the board of directors shall have such powers as the bylaws of the Corporation may from time to time confer upon them.

The power to make, alter, and amend the bylaws of the Corporation shall be in the members of the Corporation.

A majority of the directors in office at any time shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, unless the bylaws of the Corporation shall provide that a different number shall constitute a quorum, but in no case shall a quorum be less than one third of the total number of directors provided for by the bylaws, nor less than two.

The voting powers of all members of the Corporation shall be equal. Each member shall be entitled to one vote on any and all questions coming before the members. Any member entitled to vote at any meeting of the members may be represented and vote by proxy. All action taken by the members of the Corporation shall be by majority vote. A certificate of membership shall be issued to each member. No membership or certificate of membership shall be transferable save to the successor of such member in the office specified in paragraph 4 hereof, and no assignee or transferee thereof, whether by operation of law or otherwise, shall be entitled to membership in this Corporation or to any property, rights, or interest therein, unless such assignee or transferee shall be the successor in office as aforesaid of such member.

All the books, records, papers, vouchers, and documents of this Corporation shall, at all reasonable times, be open to the inspection of each member of the Corporation or to his duly constituted agent or representative.

The members and board of directors of this Corporation may hold their meetings, and have an office or offices, outside the State of Delaware, and keep the books of this Corporation (subject to the provisions of the statutes of Delaware) outside the State of Delaware at such place or places as may be from time to time designated by the members of the Corporation.

If, as, and when in the judgment of the members of the Corporation the objects and purposes of this Corporation shall be accomplished and attained, or in the event of the dissolution of the Corporation, the members of the Corporation shall cause all the assets of the Corporation, other than money, to be sold in such manner and such time or times as the members of the Corporation shall deem best to promote the public welfare, and shall pay the proceeds of such sale or sales, together with all other moneys remaining in the hands of the Corporation after the payment of its debts and expenses, into the Treasury of the United States for such uses and purposes as may be provided by statute.

Ninth. The Corporation reserves the right to amend, alter, change, or repeal any provision contained in this certificate of incorporation in the manner now or hereafter provided by statute, and all rights conferred upon the members of the Corporation are granted subject to this reservation, with the exception, however, that no such amendment, alteration, change, or repeal shall be made which would so change the objects and purposes as to permit the net income of the Corporation, or any part thereof, to inure to the benefit of any private individual or member of the Corporation.

We, the undersigned, being each of the original incorporators hereinbefore named, for the purpose of forming a corporation to carry on its activities, both within and without the State of Delaware, and in pursuance of the general corporation law of the State of Delaware and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, do make and file this certificate, hereby declaring and certifying that the facts herein stated are true, and accordingly have hereunto set our hands and seals this 4th day of October, A.D. 1933.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Be it remembered that on this 4th day of October, A.D. 1933, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, a notary public in and for the District of Columbia, Henry A. Wallace, Harold L. Ickes, and Harry L. Hopkins, being all of the parties to the foregoing certificate of incorporation, known to me personally to be such, and severally acknowledged the said certificate to be their act and deed and that the facts therein stated are truly set forth.

Given under my hand and seal of office the day and year aforesaid.

[SEAL] W. E. TAYLOR, Notary Public.

STATE OF DELAWARE,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Charles H. Grantland, secretary of state of the State of Delaware, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of certificate of incorporation of "Federal Surplus Relief Corporation," as received and filed in this office the 4th day of October, A.D. 1933, at 5 o'clock p.m.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and official seal at Dover this 4th day of October, A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] CHARLES H. GRANTLAND,
Secretary of State.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in order to understand just what this Corporation is authorized to do, I hope the Members of the Senate will read in the RECORD tomorrow morning the powers granted the organization. They are very far-reaching. They can go into business in practically every line of endeavor in the United States. The only thing which now seems to be proposed is that they ought to spend some $50,000,000 in purchasing marginal lands.

I have gone through the three acts which are the basis for the formation of this Corporation, and I can find nowhere in them any authorization for the purchase of marginal lands, or any other kind of lands, for the purposes set forth. In other words, if we buy land for a conservation corps, we buy land for a certain purpose, but there is nothing in the authorization which will permit anyone to buy land and take it out of production, acreage which is to produce crops. In other words, the purpose of these various organizations is clearly set forth. The Conservation Corps was formed with a certain purpose in mind. But when we go into the matter of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, under the A.A.A., then, if we buy land, we must buy it and be authorized to buy it for the very purpose of taking it out of cultivation. There is no such authorization anywhere in any of these laws.

I go back to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, title I, page 4, part 2, section 8—

> To provide for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods, and to provide for rental or benefit payments in connection therewith or upon that part of the production of any basic agricultural commodity required for domestic consumption, in such amounts as the Secretary deems fair and reasonable, to be paid out of any moneys available for such payments.

There is nothing there that would permit one to do other than enrich land; nothing that would permit one to take it out of cultivation. There is nothing there which says that one can buy land in order to take it out of cultivation.

Mr. President, I go back to the Industrial Recovery Act. These acts were so interwoven that it is very difficult sometimes to follow them. In section 202, page 8, this language occurs:

> The Administrator, under the direction of the President, shall prepare a comprehensive program of public works, which shall include among other things the following: (a) Construction, repair, and improvement of public highways and parkways, public buildings, and any publicly owned instrumentalities and facilities; (b) conservation and development of natural resources, including control, utilization, and purification of waters, prevention of soil or coastal erosion, development of water power, transmission of electrical energy, and construction of river and harbor improvements and flood control and also the construction of any river or drainage improvement.

What I want to suggest is that these people have taken to themselves an authority which is not implied in this law; and if they are going to make these purchases and pay for them before anybody has a right to audit their accounts, all they have to do is to submit a proposed purchase to some attorney, who will say, "Yes; you can buy this land. Go ahead and spend $50,000,000."

I admit that under the present process of spending, $50,000,000 is mere pocket change, that it does not amount to anything; but we ought to know they are spending it according to law, at least. There was never any discussion in Congress, when the Agricultural Adjustment Act was before Congress, on the question of whether or not the administration would have any right to buy marginal lands to take them out of cultivation. That was not discussed in any report I have seen. I do not believe it was ever within the mind of Congress in any way.

I find in connection with House bill 3835, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, that the House committee made a report when the bill was reported for passage. Permit me to read from page 3 of that report the following:

> In order to induce producers to bring about such reductions, the Secretary is authorized to rent acreage taken out of production, or to pay benefits to the producer to compensate him for his decrease in production. Such rentals and benefit payments are to be fair and reasonable and to be made with due regard to effectuating the declared policy of giving to the producer gradually a return for those commodities covered by the bill equivalent to their pre-war purchasing power. The rental and benefit payments are to be paid from appropriations from the Treasury. The bill, however, makes provision for raising additional revenues for the Treasury that it is believed will more than equal any expenditures resulting from operation of the act.

That reference, of course, is the processing tax. There is nothing in the act even hinting that we had a right to buy marginal lands. Yet what do we find? We find that this Corporation, organized in Delaware, is proposing to spend $50,000,000 to buy marginal lands to take them out of production.

As to whether this is right or wrong, I am not committing myself; but I do wish to say that if it is not authorized under the law, nobody in the various emergency organizations ought to want to attempt to do it; and they ought to be at least willing that some official of the Government have some supervision over the expenditure of this money, and know that it is being spent according to the terms of the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Iowa just made the statement that some Government official ought to have supervision. Have not some Government officials supervision of all of these expenditures now?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; the man who is spending the money is supervising the whole business.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. Does the Senator want someone else, who is not spending the money, to have supervision?

Mr. DICKINSON. The President says it is necessary. I am agreeing with him. I think it ought to be to my credit to agree with the President once.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is very much to the Senator's credit. The more the Senator agrees with him, the more credit the Senator will have in the country.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is very kind of the Senator from Texas; but I wish to state that the trouble was that some of the administrators convinced the President that he ought to reverse his position. I think in reversing his position he did the wrong thing.

In order that the Senate may understand something about these expenditures, I desire to suggest that the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has issued a report under date of December 23, 1933, and in that report we find the various authorizations and expenditures. For example, there is the Civil Works Administration, $400,000,- 000; Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation, $100,000,000; and so forth.

The thing which I think ought to be given consideration is that on page 4 of the report we find that the allotments are being made by the Public Works Administration, and they are being made for projects that Congress has turned down time and time again—items that are familiar to every man who has been on the Appropriations Committee in the House of Representatives. They have been turned down there dozens of times; and yet under this law, with the authority that is granted, they not only supplement the regular appropriation for practically all of the various branches of the Government but they include various projects which time and time again the Appropriations Committee and the Members of Congress have turned down as being unworthy.

I am not alone in making this statement. The criticism was started in the House Appropriations Committee by my good friend, Mr. BUCHANAN, of Texas, one of the best legislators in the House of Representatives. We served together on the same subcommittee for a number of years. He says that such things should not be permitted, and some restriction should be imposed upon the men who have these vast sums of money to expend.

Turning to page 4 of this report I find the following:

Farm Credit Administration, $100,000,000.

That is statutory.

Tennessee Valley Authority, $50,000,000.
Highways (statutory), $400,000,000.
Naval construction, $238,000,000.

It is an old story that the Navy has needed a great deal of money. I do not think people are objecting to that. The question is, however, whether or not the number of men the Navy can employ and the necessity of the occasion warrant us in borrowing at the expense of the taxpayer the money necessary to make all this expenditure at one time. The Public Works Administration is doing that very thing.

National Recovery Administration, $4,125,000.
Civilian Conservation Corps (Executive order), purchase of land, $20,000,000.

I can recall very well that in the expansion of our park system and in the expansion of the various other types of land utilization we have been carrying out a policy of buying land very cautiously for a great many years; but we find here that, regardless of the caution that has heretofore been exercised, they are allocating $20,000,000 to the Civilian Conservation Corps to go out and buy such land as they want.

Civilian Conservation Corps, other expenses, $301,000,000.
Great Smoky National Park, $1,550,000.
National Labor Board, $500,000.

We now come to the Department of Agriculture. Let me say that I hope I am somewhat familiar with a number of these items, because I was on the Appropriations Committee handling this particular bill for a number of years.

Agricultural engineering, $281,538.
Animal industry, $1,571,000.

I am going to put this entire list into the RECORD. Therefore, I will not read all of the items.

Dairy industry, $173,000.
Forest highways, $15,000,000.
Forest roads and trails, $10,000,000.
Plant industry, $3,481,000.
Plant quarantine, $2,000,000.
Forest Service, $15,982,000.

The Senate will see that labor was employed; that material was bought; but in the purchase of material and in the employment of labor in these various lines of endeavor it must be remembered that a very high price for sustenance is being paid to those who need employment. I am not objecting to any of these items on the ground that labor is being employed; but if labor is being employed at an expense to the taxpayer of this country which is far beyond any reasonable expenditure, when we have to borrow the money with which to do it, and when we are running a deficit of $7,000,000,000, it seems to me that we should at least stop, look, and listen before we expand all these projects that are old and worn out and many of them considered more or less antiquated.

With respect to the Commerce Department, I find the following:

Aeronautics, $2,558,000.
Lighthouses, $5,538,000.

We then come to the Department of the Interior, and here is the list:

Roads and trails, $24,680,000.
Boulder Canyon, $38,000,000.

I do not know how many of these projects are worthy, but here is a list of a number of them:

Parker-Gila project, $100,000.
All-American Canal, $6,000,000.
Verde River project, $4,000,000.
Vale project, $1,000,000.
Irrigation (projects bringing no new land under cultivation), $18,140,000.

Mr. President, I thought the only purpose in having an irrigation project was to bring land into cultivation. I wonder what in the world an irrigation project is for if it is not to bring land into cultivation.

We then come to another new one:

Subsistence homesteads, $25,000,000.

I have tried to ascertain where in the law there is authorization to buy land. The authorization is given to cooperate. There is an authorization, if you please, to make loans; but I do not believe there is any authorization existing in the law permitting the buying of land.

What I have in mind, Mr. President, is that the Government is going to find itself in a hundred and one difficulties that it never dreamed of when it started on this program, because we know what tremendous difficulty we had in trying to liquidate the enterprises that were entered into during the war period. It was a serious and far-reaching problem; we had housing corporations, and so forth, that we could not get rid of, and we were unable to dispose of them for years and years.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the complete allocations, beginning with the allotment of Federal agencies on page 4, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Interior Department, the Department of Justice, the Department of Labor, the Post Office Department, the State Department, the Treasury Department, and the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The non-Federal allotments include those made to railroads, designed to aid the heavy industries and at the same time increase employment. To date railroad allotments amount to $182,808,000. This includes $51,000,000 for rails and fastenings and $131,808,000 to nine railroads for new equipment, repairs to equipment, etc.

All allotments from the fund were made public in detail when the allotments were made.

Up until December 20 P.W.A. had sent to applicants 587 contracts covering non-Federal projects for which allotments have been made. In addition to the Federal projects and roads approved allotments have been made for about 1,200 non-Federal projects which are listed herewith.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has been referring to projects begun through the expenditure of moneys under the Public Works Administration.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is true.

Mr. FESS. The President states that the deficit this year will be $7,000,000,000, owing largely to emergency expenditures.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is true.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator any data showing how much money it will take to finish projects which are now being started? If it requires $7,000,000,000 this year, how much will it require next year and the following year and the year after that?

Mr. DICKINSON. First, I want the Senator from Ohio to remember that less than approximately $200,000,000 have actually been paid out of the Public Treasury in all the vast program of public works. In other words, most of it has been authorized or allocated but has not been expended. The reason why the huge deficit is facing us is that funds for all these allocations have got to be provided, although the appropriations were made last spring before Congress adjourned.

On top of that, new projects are being authorized every day, from the building of sewer systems and the graveling of streets in little villages somewhere up to $50,000,000 projects for some large enterprises or for a housing corporation.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit me, if by incurring a $7,000,000,000 deficit these projects will be completed—I am not so much concerned, but if the expenditure of $7,000,000,000 will merely start a lot of projects that cannot be completed without further expenditures, I do not see how we are going to determine how much additional is going to be required.

Mr. DICKINSON. As I understand the matter, the allocations to date have taken up all the $3,000,000,000 which have not heretofore been raised.

Mr. FESS. But will the incurring of a $7,000,000,000 deficiency result in completing everything that is started under this program?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not think it will, for the reason that new projects are being authorized all the time. A list comes into our offices almost every day, showing several million dollars of authorization, and, unless someone puts on the brakes somewhere, I do not know what the limit will be.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that in the case of the Muscle Shoals project we were told first that $10,000,000 would be sufficient. Then we voted an initial amount of $20,000,000. Afterward $40,000,000 were added, and subsequently $60,000,000 more, until the amount finally became $150,000,000; and now we are told $50,000,000 more at least must be provided before we can save what we have already expended.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is right.

Mr. FESS. I am wondering whether these projects that are being begun are so indefinite in their calls for expenditures for the future that we are going to have the Muscle Shoals experience repeated, so that we will be told, "You must provide this additional amount or lose all you have already expended."

Mr. DICKINSON. That has been the experience in the case of practically every public project we have ever undertaken.

Mr. FESS. My own impression is that the $7,000,000,000 is only a suggestion of what we shall be called upon to provide in order to save what we have already expended.

Mr. DICKINSON. But if we go ahead and make no effort to stop this thing, that $7,000,000,000 will only be the beginning; another $7,000,000,000 will be needed, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. FESS. That is what I fear. What is to be the limit of the expenditure of money for the surplus corporation?

Mr. DICKINSON. Nobody knows.

Mr. FESS. And what is to be the limit of expenditure that is going into the loaning of money directly to farmers to equip their homes with electric irons, and electric stoves, and electric lighting, vacuum cleaners, and so on? What is to be the limit?

Mr. DICKINSON. No one knows. It is going to be like the old campaign slogan, "Two chickens in every pot and a Ford in every garage." They were going to have an electric washer in every washshed, two electric toasters in every kitchen, and an electric curling iron in every boudoir.

Mr. BYRNES. Will the Senator state whose slogan it was about having two chickens in every pot?

Mr. DICKINSON. That was several years ago, and I think the Senator from South Carolina is old enough to remember it.

Mr. BYRNES. Whose slogan was it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DICKINSON. Before the Senator from Kentucky proceeds, I ask permission to insert, as part of my remarks, the Executive order authorizing the Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc., to be organized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be printed in the RECORD.

The order is as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER AUTHORIZING THE FORMING OF A CORPORATION TO BE KNOWN AS "ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY, INC."

Whereas the Congress of the United States has in the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 67, 73d Cong.), declared it to be the "policy of Congress * * * to provide for the general welfare by promoting the organization of industry for the purpose of cooperative action among trade groups, * * * to promote the fullest possible utilization of the present productive capacity of industries, to avoid undue restriction of production * * *, to increase the consumption of industrial and agricultural products by increasing purchasing power, to reduce and relieve unemployment, to improve standards of labor, and otherwise to rehabilitate industry * * *"; and

Whereas in order to effectuate such policy the President is "authorized to establish such agencies * * * as he may find necessary * * *"; and

Whereas in order effectively and efficiently to carry out said policy of the National Industrial Recovery Act, it is expedient and essential that a corporation be organized having the powers and functions of a mortgage-loan company and such other powers and functions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of said act:

Now, therefore, under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, 1933, it is hereby ordered that an agency, to wit, a corporation, under the laws of the State of Delaware, be created, said corporation to be named the Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc.

The governing body of said corporation shall consist of a board of directors composed of three members, and the following persons, who have been invited and have given their consent to serve, shall be elected by the incorporators as such directors: Arthur E. Morgan, director and chairman, Tennessee Valley Authority; Harcourt A. Morgan, director, Tennessee Valley Authority; David E. Lilienthal, director and general counsel, Tennessee Valley Authority.

The office and principal place of business of said corporation outside of the State of Delaware shall be at such place in any of the Tennessee Valley States as the board of directors shall select and determine, and offices may be established in such places as said board of directors shall select and determine.

The capital stock of said corporation shall consist of 10,000 shares of the par value of $100 each.

The persons above named are hereby authorized and directed to cause said corporation to be formed, with such articles or certificates of incorporation, and bylaws, as shall be deemed requisite and necessary, and to define the methods by which said corporation shall conduct its business.

The persons above named are hereby authorized and directed to subscribe for all of said capital stock for the use and benefit of the United States. There is hereby set aside for the purpose of subscribing to the capital stock in said corporation the sum of $1,000,000 out of the appropriation of $3,300,000,000 authorized by section 220 of the National Industrial Recovery Act and made by the Fourth Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1933, approved June 16, 1933 (Public, No. 77, 73d Cong.).

It is hereby further ordered that any outstanding stock standing in the name of the United States shall be voted by the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, jointly, or by such person or persons as the said directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall appoint as their joint agent or agents for that purpose.

The board of directors (other than the initial board of directors) shall be elected, and any vacancies thereon shall be filled by the Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, jointly, subject to the approval of the President.

The board of directors may, without regard to the provisions of the civil service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and prescribe the duties, authorities, responsibilities and tenure of such officers and employees, and make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services, and rent at the seat of the Government and elsewhere, for law books and books of reference, and for paper, binding, and printing) as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this order. The board of directors may also, with the consent of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, including any field service thereof, avail itself of the services of the officers, employees, and the facilities thereof and, with the consent of the State or municipality concerned, may utilize such State and local officers and employees as it may deem necessary.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 19, 1933.

Mr. FESS and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. What is the possible limit of the expenditure of money which may be made by the corporation just referred to by the Senator?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my understanding that there has been an allocation of $10,000,000 set aside for that corporation, but I do not have the exact figures at the time and am only speaking from memory.

Mr. FESS. If that is the amount allocated at the start, what will it be before the undertaking is completed?

Mr. DICKINSON. No one knows.

Mr. FESS. That is the serious thing in this spree of expenditure in which we are engaged. It is not so much a question with me of the amount being authorized as it is the amount that will be required in order to complete the projects which are started when once they are undertaken in order to avoid losing what has already been put into them. It seems to me there is absolutely no limit to it.

Mr. DICKINSON. It seems to me that is a fair inference.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not he has submitted to this body his estimate of the amount of money that will be required to complete every single project that has been inaugurated according to advices from the President of the United States?

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the Senator inquire if I have made any such estimate?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will say to the Senator, bless his heart, that I could not get within gunshot of finding out all the projects or where they are or what they propose to do, because they meet themselves coming back nearly every day with some new projects which had not been thought of before. The administration is organizing now corporations which are authorized to expend more money for new and particular purposes. I believe that under the authority of one of the laws enacted by Congress, particularly the National Recovery Act, some of these corporations are legal. On the other hand, I do not know where the movement will lead us, if we keep on. We are going to have a corporation, I understand, to handle foreign imports and exports; we are going to have corporations to provide electrical equipment to consumers in the Tennessee Valley. Already a corporation has been formed to buy farm surpluses and a corporation to buy marginal land. There is a corporation authorized to go into the housing business; there are corporations in practically every line of endeavor. I do not believe that one could get information from the various bureaus of this Government that would enable him to make anything like an intelligent guess as to the amount which will be required ultimately to pay the cost.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to make inquiry of the Senator as to whether or not it would have been possible for the present administration to have provided for the millions upon millions of distressed human beings in this country had it not been for the measures inaugurated by the administration? Further than that, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument presented by the Senator, and I should like to have him state his specific objection to the various items of which he has made mention from time to time. In that connection, at this time, I should like to ask the Senator to state to this body his specific objection to the millions which have been expended by the Government in caring for and providing for 347,000 young men who are today members of the Civilian Conservation Corps in this country. That is merely one of the items.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will express myself on nearly all the items mentioned from time to time. I am going to discuss in a limited way only one of them today. If the Senator will attend here on the floor of the Senate he will hear me, from time to time, and I will be glad to give him my views as to practically every endeavor in which the Government is now engaged.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have made the suggestion to the Senator, Mr. President, because I know that a great many Members of this distinguished body are desirous of having the Senator's specific objection to each of these items; and if he will comply with the request I feel confident that we will be in a position to enlighten him as to many of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Referring to the suggestion just made by the Senator from Iowa, I will say that I expect to be able to attend most of the sessions of the Senate. I should like, however, to inquire of him now in relation to the remark he made a while ago that he had not been able to get within gunshot of any information with reference to any of the items of expenditure.

Mr. DICKINSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that, before the Senate convened, I submitted numerous inquiries thinking that I would obtain a little information that I might present to the Senate. Many of those inquiries have gone unanswered for 2 weeks, 3 weeks, 4 weeks, and longer. It may be that a Republican Senator is not entitled to such information; that is all.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator no doubt realizes that most of these expenditures made under appropriations for emergencies have been made under the jurisdiction of the Administrator of Public Works. We provided that he might make grants and loans and that he might make them separately or that he might combine them. With reference to the loaning provision, does the Senator say that he has made inquiry of the Secretary of the Interior, who happens to be the Administrator of the Public Works Administration, with reference to the amount allocated either for loans or for grants to various communities, cities, counties, and other subdivisions of government with respect to public projects, and has been unable to obtain that information?

Mr. DICKINSON. I have not made that specific request, but we have a long list of projects here running all the way from a few hundred dollars up to several million dollars, such as the project at Columbus, Ohio, involving $3,400,000 for sewers. I know nothing about that, but I am going to inquire.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not suppose the Senator would expect the Secretary of the Interior to send to him or to us the blueprints, the plans and specifications showing where and how these sewers are to be laid; but does not the Senator know that almost each day we receive a list of new applications from cities and other subdivisions of government, the purpose for which they are made, the amount of the application, and later that we receive the same sort of information with respect to those that have been approved or which have been acted upon in any way? What other detailed information does the Senator want, or does he think the Senate ought to have, with respect to each of these projects except that a certain amount has been asked and a certain amount has been allocated, and that the work has been done for certain purposes?

Mr. DICKINSON. I have not been criticizing the grants to small municipalities, because, as I have said, they represent mere pocket change compared to the amounts expended on the larger projects. It is the larger projects, many of which have been before Congress for years and years and have been rejected, to which I have been directing my attention.

Mr. BARKLEY. There may have been projects upon which Congress never acted, but it is not true that all of the projects, or any considerable number of those which have been authorized under the Public Works Administration, are projects which Congress has considered and refused to act upon at all. Many of them have never been passed upon at all.

Mr. DICKINSON. Many of them have been here as long as I have been here and have never had favorable mention.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows that many worthy projects stand here for years and years and never receive any action.

Mr. DICKINSON. If they could not attract the attention of Congress in those times, I am a little doubtful about the poor taxpayer being obligated for the money to build those projects which heretofore have not been able to sell themselves to Congress on their merits.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I would like to ask the Senator, apropos of "a chicken in every pot", which costs the taxpayer nothing, what it has cost the taxpayer to put a "blue duck" in every window? [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not have the exact amount of that expense, but it is somewhere around $7,000,000,000, as I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Without in any way passing upon the question of whether two chickens or any chicken at all was put in every pot, we have at least succeeded in putting a "blue duck", as the Senator from Minnesota terms it, in every window.

Mr. DICKINSON. A lot of them have gone into the windows and gone out again and are forgotten. As a matter of fact, what happened to many of the "blue ducks" was that they were put in the window, and then the manager of the business never spoke to them after the time he put them in there, but went ahead and ran his business just as he thought he should.

Mr. President, there are one or two further phases of the matter to which I want to invite attention. No one can in any way imply that in my motives I am not as sympathetic with the man who is hungry as is anyone else. I believe in feeding the man who is hungry, and there is no reason why he should not be fed; but I want to suggest that in the Civil Works Administration many useless projects have been proposed and a lot of them have been acted upon. In order that Senators may understand just the motive behind some of them, I want to read a letter which I have here from a man by the name of C. G. Kelley, of Jefferson, Iowa, written to the editor of the Tribune in Des Moines, Iowa. The letter reads:

To the EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

I notice some company at Ames has 426 men engaged in the precarious work of killing mosquitoes, and they are going to put on 200 more, making 626 men. I said killing mosquitoes. Really, I guess, it is mosquito control.

I am out of a job, and I am wondering if you could help me get started with those people.

As you know, a person can buy common lath at about 1 cent each. I could cut a lath in four pieces and make a kind of paddle. They could catch the mosquitoes and hit them with one of these paddles, and if they were not too ferocious it would kill them.

I would be willing to furnish these to the Government for, say, $5 each, if they would need 626 of them.

I would furnish them for an even $3,000, and you see that would save the Government $130.

Now, the men that operate these paddles should not be required to work longer than 1 hour in the forenoon and 1 hour in the afternoon, as it might cause callous of the hands.

Really I don't think it is very good sportsmanship to go out after those animals when it is 15 below and have the water all frozen up so they cannot dive out of the way when they see the soldiers coming.

We would not shoot a duck sitting on the water or a pheasant standing eating corn off a stalk.

I think we had better get this deal through pretty soon, as I am afraid that at the present rate of extravagance there will not be any money left to pay for the paddles.

C. G. KELLEY, Jefferson, Iowa.

I also read in the newspapers that they are going to buy a famous duck preserve somewhere. The Government is going to be authorized to charge the taxpayers and make them pay interest in the next 2 years in order to buy duck preserves that will cost some two or three million dollars. They are also going to have real-estate men and architects make a survey of housing conditions in the country to determine whether or not we shall build more or build less. They are even going to paint pictures in some of the courthouses that have been getting along without pictures for a great many years, and yet that is a part of the Civil Works Administration program.

They are going even further than that. According to the Evening Star, in Owls Head, N.Y., on December 30, they were very much afraid that the wolves were going to make an invasion of that locality and therefore they are going to have the Civil Works Administration make an allocation of many thousands of dollars to kill the wolves in that region.

I do not refer to these things simply to criticize the whole program, but I do say that they are merely indicative of the fact that if we permit these various functions to proceed, we are going to charge numerous useless expenses against the Government which the taxpayers of the United States are going to have to pay, and that is one reason why I believe we should have some check on the expenditures. In my resolution I have asked that copies of the various reports coming to the Director of the Budget shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate. If they are not of interest to anybody else they are going to be of interest to me, because I am going to borrow them and take them home and read them one at a time to see whether or not there is some way by which some curtailment of expenditures can be made, not those that are needed, not those that are useful, but those that are useless and worthless and will not, if you please, do the things that were proposed to be done under the legislation which was enacted.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer (Mr. BARBOUR in the chair) laid before the Senate messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Thomas J. Sheehan, of St. Louis, Mo., to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Missouri in place of Louis J. Becker, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the "I am that I am" and our Heavenly Father, too, who forgives, who redeems, and who satisfies, waken in our souls an unutterable silence and grandly vitalize our way. Inspire us to adorn our station with sincere devotion and unyielding fidelity. Guard our speech, quicken our steps on errands of mercy, and make our hearts to rejoice in the doing of the fine and lovely things of life. As we walk amid the sunlight and the shade in life's garden we pray that our example may refresh and not oppress, may liven and not deaden while heaven's light burns clean and deep in our breasts. Blessed Lord, God of love, give Thy blessing of encouragement, comfort, and rest to the down-hearted, the oppressed, and the homeless, and may we use the might of our mission to bring them relief; so direct us, our Heavenly Father. In the name of our Savior we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE IDEAS OF DR. SCHURMAN ON THE CHARACTER AND TENDENCIES OF THE AMERICAN REGIME IN THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. OSIAS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech on Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, the president of the First Philippine Commission, by the Filipino leader and statesman, Senator Sergio Osmeña.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I give hereunder a speech by the Filipino leader and statesman, Senator Sergio Osmeña, at the Columbian Institute, November 27, 1933, dealing with the ideas and ideals of Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, the great American who was chosen by President McKinley to be president of the first American Philippine Commission sent to the islands:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, profoundly grateful for the honor of being your guest today, permit me to make a few remarks on the Influence of the Ideas of Dr. Schurman on the Character and Tendencies of the American Regime in the Philippines. Dr. Schurman has just visited us for the third time. As it was to be expected, he was enthusiastically welcomed not only by the different elements of our people but also by the Americans and foreigners who live with us. This recent visit of Dr. Schurman and the speeches which he had delivered during his stay here render timely the consideration of the subject which I have chosen and which I would have liked to discuss more extensively and in detail if I had the necessary time.

When, after the victory of the American forces, Spain was preparing to transfer to the United States the sovereignty over these islands, the American Government became confronted with a great problem in defining the political relations that it was to have with the Philippines; whereupon President McKinley called Dr. Schurman, who was then president of the University of Cornell, and made him chairman of the first Philippine Commission, whose prime duty was to study the conditions in the Philippines and recommend to the United States the policy to be followed with regard to the same. The Schurman Commission arrived in Manila on March 4, 1899, and stayed here for about 7 months.

The task that was entrusted by President McKinley to Dr. Schurman and his associates was of an extremely delicate nature. The Commission made as thorough an investigation as it was possible to make considering the status of war that it found in the Philippines, with the American and Filipino forces in open hostilities. An extensive study was made of all the phases of our political and social problems, including the questions of population, education, legislation, public lands, public institutions, agriculture, forestry, meteorology, mines, railroad, and commerce. Special attention was given to the government which had been implanted by the Spaniards and the reforms which from time to time have been demanded by the Filipinos. The study that had been made by the Schurman Commission is of indisputable value; indeed, I consider it the most important of all that had been made during the whole period of American occupation. The result of the investigation has been published in a report of four volumes, replete with most interesting data regarding the political, economic, and social conditions then prevailing.

Whatever may be the real value of the investigation, and whatever few mistakes may have been made in the appreciation of existing conditions—errors which are natural and inevitable in a work of this nature, undertaken in a foreign land, and in the midst of abnormal conditions—the portion of the report which is of greatest interest to us is that which refers to the formulation of the policy which should be followed by the United States in the Philippines. The Commission recommended a form of government giving immediately to the Filipinos a participation which shall gradually be increased until the people shall be in a condition to completely assume the responsibility imposed upon the United States by the Treaty of Paris. The Philippines was not to be an American state or an American colony. Neither was it to be independent under the protectorate of the United States. The political relations were to be of a temporary rather than permanent character. In the last analysis, the plan of Dr. Schurman was one of gradual preparation for independence.

Let me mention two outstanding features of the plan of government submitted by the Commission: The first salient feature was autonomy for the provinces and municipalities. Dr. Schurman was highly shocked with the so-called "intervention" of the central government which appeared in the plans of government which had been submitted to him by some Filipinos. The second outstanding feature of the recommendation was the grant of popular participation in the national legislature through an elective assembly, coupled with the Filipinization of administrative positions, insofar as possible; the adoption of an efficient civil-service system; an independent judiciary; and free elementary instruction, and the giving of a representation to the Filipinos in the United States. The Philippine Government was to be self-supporting and the government was to be run for the interest of the Filipinos. The exploitation of the islands as a colony was not to be allowed. The United States was not to vote any funds for the expenses of the Philippine Government but neither was the income of the Philippines to be employed for the benefit of the Government of the United States.

The motto of the Government was to be the "Philippines for the Filipinos." This was the same slogan which gave fame to Governor Taft when he came to the Philippines as the President of the second commission and later became governor under the civil government. The circumstances under which Dr. Schurman announced for the first time in 1902, the motto of the "Philippines for the Filipinos", reveal his real objective. The Taft Commission, which was then exercising government functions in the Philipines, asked that it be given legislative power to authorize the issuance of bonds; to grant municipal franchise; to dispose of the public lands, mines, and forces; to regulate corporations and grant railroad franchises. Dr. Schurman, who had gone back to Cornell after the commission over which he had presided had completed is tasks, was following the progress of the work in the Philippines. Generally, he gave his cordial support to the administration of the Taft Commission; but when the latter asked for the legislative prerogatives above mentioned, Dr. Schurman favorably indorsed the petition on one condition—that the Philippine Assembly, whose creation had been recommended, be immediately established so that in dealing with the important problems for the solution of which the legislative authority was asked, the Filipino people could intervene. To epitomize his views he said that "the Philippines should be for the Filipinos."

The recommendations of the Schurman Commission were first submitted to President McKinley, and later in February 1900, to Congress. The government that was implanted by the Americans in the Philippines, from the inauguration of the civil government in July 1900, and especially after the approval by Congress of the Cooper Act of July 1, 1902, was substantially the government recommended by the Schurman Commission.

The substantial closeness between the recommendations of the Schurman Commission and the plans of the Taft Commission has been reflected in the similarity of the views which have been expressed by Dr. Schurman and Mr. Taft in relation to certain important questions.

As I have stated, Dr. Schurman had expressed himself in 1902, in favor of the policy that the Philippines should be for the Filipinos. In his memorable speech delivered on December 17, 1903, Mr. Taft stated that the honor of the American people was pledged to the policy of "the Philippines for the Filipinos."

Both Dr. Schurman and Mr. Taft spurned the suggestion of the exploitation of the Philippines for the benefit of the United States. Both stated positively that America was in the Philippines to promote the well-being of the Filipinos.

Dr. Schurman and Mr. Taft also coincided in their views regarding the capacity for self-government which we should reveal during the constitutional process required by the United States. Let me quote their words on this subject:

"Capacity for independent self-government", Dr. Schurman said, "does not necessarily mean capacity like ours to administer a Commonwealth like ours, but merely capacity of some sort to maintain peace and order, to uphold law, and to fulfill international obligations."

And Mr. Taft used the following language:

"The standard set, of course, is not that of perfection or such a government capacity as that of an Anglo-Saxon people, but it certainly ought to be one of such popular political capacity, that complete independence in its exercise will result in progress rather than retrogression to chaos or tyranny."

That the plan of giving the Filipinos a gradually greater participation in the government recommended by Dr. Schurman as a basic policy, and put into practice by Mr. Taft, should inevitably lead to the independence of the Philippines, was a fact admitted by both Dr. Schurman and Mr. Taft. In his speech in Manila on October 16, 1907, on the occasion of the inauguration of the Philippine Assembly, Mr. Taft said as an envoy of President Roosevelt:

"The avowed policy of the national administration under these two Presidents (McKinley and Roosevelt) has been and is to govern the islands, having regard to the interest and welfare of the Filipino people, and by the spread of general primary and industrial education and by practice in partial political control to fit the people themselves to maintain a stable and well-ordered government, affording equality of right and opportunity to all citizens. The policy looks to the improvement of the people, both industrially and in self-governing capacity. As this policy of extending control continues, it must logically reduce and finally end the sovereignty of the United States in the islands unless it shall seem wise to the American and the Filipino peoples, on account of mutually beneficial trade relations and possible advantage to the islands in their foreign relations, that the bond shall not be completely severed."

Dr. Schurman was no less explicit and positive in his utterances. Considering the fact, which to him was fundamental, that the political emancipation of the Filipinos was the paramount object which had moved President McKinley to demand the cession of the Philippines and that, according to President Roosevelt, America hoped to do for the Philippines what has never been done for any people of the tropics—to make them fit for self-government after the fashion of the really free nations, Dr. Schurman said:

"I say you will never consent to make the Philippine Islands an integral and organic part of the United States of America. * * * Very well; what then? A colony, a dependency? For a time this status may suffice; as a permanent arrangement it is impossible. For you propose to dower the Filipinos with an ever-increasing measure of liberty; but liberty grows by what it feeds on, and moves rapidly to its goal, which is independence. Then, too, the Filipinos have condensed the experience of centuries into these last half dozen years. They have dreamed of liberty; they have fought for liberty; they have seen in the east the star of independence. These are facts as potent as any other—and deeper than most—in the life of nations. * * * From the American point of view, then, ever-increasing liberty and self-government is to be our policy toward the Filipinos; and it is the nature of such continuously expanding liberty to issue in independence. This, then, is our program for the future, both near and remote."

And discarding the possibility of annexation, either forcible or voluntary, he concluded:

"The watchword of progress, the key to the future of the political development of the archipelago, is neither colonialism nor federalism, but nationalism. The destiny of the Philippine Islands is not to be a State or Territory in the United States of America but a daughter republic of ours—a new birth of liberty on the other side of the Pacific, which shall animate and energize those lovely islands of the tropical seas, and, rearing its head aloft, stand as a monument of progress and a beacon of hope to all the oppressed and benighted millions of the Asiatic Continent."

But great as was the service rendered by Dr. Schurman to his country and to the Philippines for the liberal recommendations which he had made to President McKinley with regards to the government which America should implant in the Philippines, his greatest service, not only to the two countries but to the cause of freedom, was the official recognition made by him in the midst of the then critical political situation that independence was the supreme and final aspiration of all the Filipinos. This view he announced in the official report of the first Philippine Commission. Convinced of the justice of this aspiration, he openly and publicly advocated for our independence immediately after he had resigned from the Commission. The address which he delivered on January 11, 1902, in Cornell University on the Philippine problems, constituted not merely a defense of the American policy in the Philippines but of the fundamental aspiration of the Filipinos to be independent. I recommend to the faculty and students of the Columbian Institute the careful reading of that address of Dr. Schurman which is so little known among us. I consider it interesting and instructive and, above all, humane.

Dr. Schurman has never deviated from this basic principle of his Philippine policy—our ultimate independence. Not only in the speeches which he had recently made in the Philippines, but in all the addresses which he had made in the United States during all these years, especially his speeches during the consideration by Congress of the Hare bill and the Hawes-Cutting bill, he had emphatically reiterated that the aspiration of the Filipinos and the duty of America in the Philippines perfectly coincide—the recognition of our independence.

In urging Congress to approve either of the two bills as a just and proper solution of the Philippine problem, Dr. Schurman expressed himself in clear and unequivocal language, thus:

"Our mission in the Philippine Islands is finished. The rest the Filipinos must do for themselves. It is for us to give them the opportunity by granting them complete independence.

"The hour for action has arrived. I ask in the language of the act of Congress, Are the American people now ready 'to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence?' I repeat the inquiry in the words of President Wilson, Are we now prepared 'to keep our promise to the people of these islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet?' Remember, it was the humanitarian object of liberating the Filipinos from Spanish tyranny and bestowing upon them the boon of freedom that decided President McKinley and the people of the United States to compel Spain to cede to us her sovereignty over the Philippine Islands.

"Fortunate, indeed, that no lower motive prevailed. Any other object than the humanitarian one of carrying the gift of freedom to the Filipinos would have ended in vast and bitter disappointment or, perhaps, even in poignant remorse. Did we need the Philippines to make our power felt in Asia? No; for we can exert the most potent national influence in all quarters of the world without owning adjacent territory. And had we gone to the Philippines for commercial gain, when, think you, would our traders' profits have amounted to the hundred of millions of dollars which the archipelago has already cost us? And what shall I say of the thousands of brave young Americans who have lost their lives in the Philippines? No prospect of profit, however assured, no wealth or advantage, however colossal, could ever atone for the precious American lifeblood swallowed up by the hungry soil of Luzon and the Visayas. For such a sacrifice there is only one justification. It is the discharge of duty, service in a righteous cause. If our presence in the Philippines be not justified in its purpose and intent, then our soldiers' blood is on our hands; aye, and all the blood, in that case innocent, of the Filipinos we have fought, the misery we have caused their families, and the devastation we have wrought in their homes.

"This awful responsibility we cannot escape, either before our own consciences or at the bar of history, unless we have done what we have done in the Philippines for the sake of redeeming the Filipinos from foreign oppression, saving them from domestic anarchy, and leading them into the ways of self-government and independence. That is a blessing at once unmeasured and immeasurable. That blessing, and that blessing alone, justifies our Philippine enterprise."

"Yesterday the Philippines were a dependency of America. Tomorrow they will be a sister republic. May the two nations and peoples be united eternally in the bonds of a close and intimate friendship."

The permanent place of Dr. Schurman in the political history of our country is assured. His ideals and his principles are firmly and definitely imbedded in our fundamental institutions. His name shall figure in the roll of honor of the champions of human liberty.

IN PURSUIT OF AMERICA'S PURPOSE

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the speech of the Honorable Elpidio Quirino, majority floor leader of the Philippine Senate, delivered on December 20, 1933, before the Foreign Policy Association at Chicago, informing the Government and people of the United States of the views of those who opposed the acceptance of Act No. 311, commonly known as the "Hare-Hawes-Cutting law", enacted by Congress on January 17, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of the Honorable Elpidio Quirino, majority floor leader of the Philippine Senate, delivered on December 20, 1933, before the Foreign Policy Association at Chicago, informing the Government and people of the United States of the views of those who opposed the acceptance of Act No. 311, commonly known as the "Hare-Hawes-Cutting law" enacted by Congress on January 17, 1933:

I wish to express my deep appreciation for the opportunity extended to me to bring to your attention the present status of the Filipino struggle for liberty. As you are all aware, a law was enacted in the last session of the Seventy-second Congress purporting to grant Philippine independence after 10 years of transition from the establishment of a Philippine Commonwealth government provided thereunder. Before this law was to be operative the Philippine Legislature or a national convention called for the purpose should accept it. The Philippine Legislature, however, declined to accept the law, and instead created a new Independence Delegation to proceed to the United States to restate the Philippine case to the Government and people of this country.

For the last 35 years the Filipino people have been unequivocally expressing their desire to be free and independent from the United States. After wresting the Philippines from Spanish power and establishing a republic at Malolos, the Filipino army, mistaking right for might, resisted American occupation and received a staggering blow. Henceforth America remained in possession of the Philippines and established therein a government which, in the words of United States Presidents, both Democratic and Republican, was merely preparatory to Filipino self-government and independence.

In 1916, as you will remember, Congress made patent this purpose by enacting the Jones law, which promised to grant complete Philippine independence as soon as a stable government has been established in the islands. In 1920 President Wilson certified to Congress that this condition was fulfilled and that it was the duty of the United States to grant the coveted Filipino freedom. But the Congress failed to act upon this recommendation of President Wilson.

We have employed all means of appeal, from memorials and petitions to national prayer. Missions after missions have been sent to the United States since 1919. At last, on January 17, 1933, the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act was passed, making a proffer of independence.

The natural and logical question that may be asked now is, Why did the Philippine Legislature decline to accept this law?

To those who have not closely followed the trend of events which led to the nonacceptance of this law, or who have not carefully analyzed its probable ill effects upon the economic and political future of the Philippines, it may seem strange that the Philippine Legislature should decline to accept said law when its avowed purpose was to grant the islands independence. In order that you may the better understand the position of the Filipino people in this regard and in order also that the real purpose of the new Philippine Independence Delegation now present in the United States may be made clearer, I beg leave to seek your indulgence so that I can present the informational background of the negative action of the Philippine Legislature. I shall not tire you with the full details. I shall only point out two or three, or perhaps four, of the most important reasons upon which the insular legislature based its action.

The first is the provision of the law which gives the United States, at the discretion of the President, the right to have and hold forever military and naval reservations in the Philippine Islands after independence shall have been granted. At present there are about 250,000 hectares of land in the Philippine Islands reserved by the United States as military and naval outposts. Some of them are located in very strategic places from the standpoint of commerce and national defense. These military and naval reservations include the Corregidor Island, the Cavite Navy Yard, and the Mariveles Naval Station, all of which are found in the entrance of the Manila Bay and constitute the key to the national defense of the capital of the Philippine Islands, which is at the same time the center of commerce of the archipelago. In the very city of Manila, dotted near each other, and in the midst of the most thickly inhabited districts of the city, there are at least five military reservations, while in the immediate vicinity of Manila along the Pasig River there is the Fort McKinley, of several square miles. A few miles north from the city of Manila there is the Camp Stotsenburg, the largest of them all, and almost immediately west of this reservation there is the Masinloc Naval Reservation. Scattered throughout the northern part of the island of Luzon there are other military and naval reservations—in Baguio, Mountain Province; Burgos, Ilocos Norte; Cauayan, Isabela Province; and other places.

In the southern part of Luzon and throughout the Visayan Islands there are also military and naval reservations, most important of which are those in Los Banos, Laguna; Sorsogon, Samar, Leyte, Palawan, Romblon, and Iloilo. While in the island of Mindano and in the Sulu group, and scattered throughout the coasts and occupying the best strategic points for defense and commercial ports there are also military and naval reservations in Overton and Camp Keithly, both in the Province of Lanao; three military reservations in Zamboanga, the most important and beautiful port of Mindanao; the military reservation in Jolo, and other places in the southernmost point of the archipelago. In all, there are about 62 United States military and other reservations in the Philippine Islands.

Under the provisions of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act any or all of these military and other reservations can be retained as the property and for the permanent use of the United States by presidential redesignation within 2 years after the declaration of Philippine independence.

Let us not be misunderstood in our objection to this power and discretion given to the President of the United States under the law. It is not that we are absolutely unwilling to grant or cede to the United States Government some naval or coaling stations that the Federal Government may need for its own purposes, but we certainly cannot conceive how the Philippines could be really and truly independent if the United States is to retain and maintain indefinitely military and naval reservations scattered throughout the archipelago and in the most important strategic and commercial places.

Another objection to this military and naval provision is based upon the fact that it would seem likely to defeat the desired neutralization of the Philippine Islands. The Hare-Hawes-Cutting Law authorizes the President of the United States to negotiate with foreign powers treaties that would guarantee the neutrality of the Philippines. It is at least doubtful whether nations having interests in the Pacific would care to guarantee the neutrality of a country in which one of the great powers has so many military and naval reservations. We, of course, know that there are many people who have lost faith in treaties and who give very little or no importance to the neutralization of the Philippines as a means of insuring the peace and territorial integrity and independence of that little country. But as we know of no other way whereby small nations could be protected from foreign aggression, and as, in any event, this is the course which the United States Congress has adopted, we are perfectly satisfied with it and therefore wish that every possible objection to the accomplishment of this purpose be eliminated.

The next main reason of the negative action of the Philippine Legislature on the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act is based upon the trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands during the 10-year period previous to the granting of independence. Under the provisions of this much-discussed law, Philippine products exported to the United States during these 10 years will be limited in volume, and the excess export shall pay the full rate of tariff that is imposed upon foreign goods entering the United States. But even the Philippine products that would come into the United States within the specified limits, as well as all other Philippine goods entering duty-free without being included in the free list, shall have to pay an export tax beginning from the sixth year of this transition period. This export tax would increase annually by 5 percent until it becomes 25 percent of the full rate on the tenth year. At the end of the tenth year, the full rate of the American tariff shall be imposed upon all Philippine goods entering the United States. By the way, export tax, as you know, is prohibited by the Constitution.

An analysis of the probable effects of this tax upon the major Philippine industries shows that, before the end of the 10-year transition period, the Philippine sugar industry, coconut industry, and cordage industry, as well as other important industries like the tobacco, embroidery, and button industries, shall have been ruined. This, of course, will affect, adversely, the revenues of the Philippine Government and impoverish the country. On the other hand, American products would enter the Philippine markets free of duty and without any limitation.

The present free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippines were established in 1909 against the objections of the Filipino representatives both at home and in Congress. Because of this trade arrangement, the volume of trade between the United States and the Philippines has tremendously increased—from ₱42,343,688 in 1909 to ₱267,891,232 in 1932—representing an increase in the share of the United States in the total trade of the islands from 32.07 percent in 1909 to 77 percent in 1932. This trade also represents an increase in the total imports of the islands from the United States, from 20.73 percent in 1909 to 65 percent in 1932 of the total import trade of the islands, while it represents an increase in Philippine exports to the United States from 42.17 percent in 1909 to 87 percent in 1932 of the total export trade of the Philippines.

Although there has been a mutual increase in the volume of trade between the two countries, official statistics show that the proportion of increase has been greatly in favor of the United States. To illustrate, the average yearly exports of the Philippines to the United States for the 10-year period immediately preceding the establishment of free trade (1899–1908) was ₱19,026,915, while the average yearly exports for a similar period of 10 years thereafter (1921–30) was ₱193,461,847. This shows an increase of 391.2 percent for the Philippine Islands. On the other hand, the exports of the United States to the Philippine Islands for the 10-year period, from 1899 to 1908, show a yearly average of ₱8,073,367, as compared with the average yearly exports to the islands for the 10-year period from 1921 to 1930, amounting to ₱139,921,006, representing an increase of 1,633.1 percent. Thus, while Philippine exports to the United States have increased only 391 percent, United States exports to the Philippines have creased 1,633 percent.

Official statistics show also that as a whole, from 1909 to 1930, Philippine exports to the United States have increased by 615 percent as compared with 1,113 percent increase in the exports of the United States to the Philippines during the same period.

But, besides the fact that the United States has derived more advantage from the present free-trade relations between the two countries, the Philippine Islands, which takes from the United States 65 percent of the total import trade of the islands, and exports to this country 87 percent of the total Philippine export trade, has become completely dependent upon and is now economically at the mercy of the United States because of these free-trade relations.

It is not, therefore, the desire of the Filipino people to continue indefinitely with this arrangement specially if it is not the wish of the American people. But it is evident that the Filipino people should be given reasonable time, and under favorable conditions, to set up their own economic structure independent of the United States. It may be argued that such is precisely the reason why there is provided under the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law a period of 10 years during which the Philippines is expected to make its economic readjustment. Yes, 10 years are sufficient for this purpose, and if the limitations imposed upon the free entrance of our products into the United States were based upon the status quo, that is to say, upon our present exports, and the export tax were eliminated, the provisions of the law as amended in this manner would meet the economic situation.

It should be emphasized, however, that our desire to safeguard the economic and financial position of the Philippines is not predicated upon any intention on our part to give undue importance to the material things of life as compared with spiritual and moral values. To us, freedom is everything. But in these times in which we live no country can be truly independent unless it can support itself. And it is precisely because we want to insure not only the granting but the maintaining of our independence as well that we feel in duty bound to call the attention of the American Government and people to the financial and economic difficulties which would confront our country under the trade provisions of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law.

I repeat, the trade relations between your country and ours have been forced upon us by Congress. In the course of years such trade relations, artificially fostered by the American tariff, have made the islands dependent upon the American market. A sudden closing of this market or an undue curtailment of our exports into the United States before we have time to prepare ourselves for world competition would be disastrous. And if this were to happen there will be many people who, uninformed of the causes thereof, would attribute it to the incapacity or inability of the Filipino people to establish and maintain their own government. The reaction in this country to such a situation in the Philippines will likely be that the promised independence should not be granted at the end of the 10-year transition period.

Resuming, therefore, the Hare-Hawes-Cutting law is self-defeating in that with the provisions regarding United States military and naval reservations complete Philippine independence is incompatible, and with the trade relations thereunder our country will be ruined.

One sentimental but not secondary objection to the law consists in the fact that under it Filipino immigrants to the United States would be treated as bona fide foreigners under the quota basis during the transition period, and thereafter as undesirable foreign elements to be absolutely excluded from the mainland. On the other hand, for the benefit of the sugar planters in Hawaii, these immigrants may go into that Territory of the United States in any number, depending upon the needs of the plantations and subject to the approval of the Federal Secretary of the Interior. If it were not for the fact that under the commonwealth constitution the Filipino people are compelled to acknowledge, respect, and safeguard the existing rights of American citizens and corporations in the Philippine Islands to the same extent as if they were of Filipino citizens and corporations, and that during all the period of transition American citizens in the islands would enjoy practically the same rights and privileges as Filipinos themselves enjoy in their own country, the discriminatory provisions of the law against Filipino immigrants into the United States would not have the importance that the Filipino people have attached to it out of racial dignity and pride. Certainly, we cannot conscientiously understand why we should be considered as undesirable foreigners in one case and as subjects or mere commodity in another, depending upon whether or not the Filipino immigrants could be utilized by the American people. If the Filipinos are not wanted in this country, we could perhaps find another scheme for our honorable exit.

There are several other secondary objections to this law that enter into the composite grounds for not accepting it. Among these are the denial of currency autonomy, immigration autonomy and foreign relations autonomy, practically all of which are placed under the direct control and supervision of the United States during the transition period, but which are essential instrumentalities in the preparation for a Philippine independent existence. However, we cannot too well indulge in fault-finding or hair-splitting and scrupulously quibble over the provisions of a law that makes an honest offer of liberty. But the Filipinos would not be loyal to the American people if we did not frankly and sincerely lay bare before this country the reasons for not accepting it in the form in which it has been offered.

As a whole, it is the honest belief of the Philippine Legislature, that the provisions of the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act do not achieve the very purpose of the American Congress to finally dispose of the Philippine question. The Filipino people are not unmindful of the highest motives of the American Congress in approving the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act. It constitutes another source of the traditional gratitude and loyalty of the whole Filipino race toward the American Government and people.

But precisely because the United States meant to give our people the freedom for which they have been yearning for years under conditions that would be compatible with America's altruistic purpose announced in the incipiency of her occupation of the Philippines, the Philippine Legislature did not hesitate to take advantage of the privilege offered by the United States Congress under the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act to frankly decline it, that we may have an opportunity to restate our case before Congress. Rather, this act of the Legislature is in pursuit of the noble purposes of the United States toward the Philippine Islands. We have been encouraged by the pronouncements of the Chief Executives of this Nation, both Democratic and Republican, by the specific pledge of the United States Congress, by the history of American administration over the Islands, and by the lofty traditions and ideals of the United States as a liberty-loving country whose liberating mission among other weaker and subject peoples has not failed. We are confident that our moral cause is won. What remains now to be done is perhaps to lay down anew at a round table the cold facts and figures from both sides of the Pacific in a last supreme effort to make them tally and coincide with the march of the minutes and the seconds of the independence clock so that when the hour of final redemption shall strike, it will strike to the satisfaction and honor of America and the Philippines.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1934

Mr. WOODRUM, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill. Pending the consideration of that motion, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, of course, printed copies of the bill just reported are not available for the Membership; but in order to give Members of the House who desire to make speeches an opportunity to do so, and in order to save as much time as possible, we thought it expedient to go into the Committee and use such time as might be desired today. It is the intention of the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to ask for a special rule relative to the legislative provisions carried in this bill. As I understand it, that rule cannot be taken up for consideration until Friday, unless by consent. Therefore, it is the present intention to have general debate for a while today and conclude general debate tomorrow and be ready to take up the rule on Friday upon the convening of the House, dispose of that and read the bill for amendment, with the hope that we can conclude its consideration by Friday night.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, there will be important subject matters to be considered in connection with the rule to make in order legislation on the bill. I have no disposition to in any way interfere with the program as presented by the gentleman from Virginia, but I hope he will not limit the time too much on the discussion of the rule, because that is the important thing in connection with this whole bill. To a certain extent it necessitates the discussion of some legislation in the bill. I hope when the time comes for the consideration for the discussion of the rule that he will not say that we have had considerable general debate upon the bill already and that it is not necessary to have much time on the rule. I am perfectly willing to go along with the program, but with the hope that he will grant sufficient time for proper consideration of the rule.

Mr. WOODRUM. I agree with what the gentleman says, but, of course, the gentleman understands that I will not have control of the time on the rule. I realize that probably the principal controversy, if there is controversy, will arise over the adoption of the rule. Probably the whole matter will be settled one way or the other right there. I have no doubt but that those in charge of the rule will be able to give ample time for its consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless the Rules Committee is able to report the rule today, and have it printed tonight, we could not debate the rule tomorrow. There could be much more debate, unlimited almost, if the rule could be taken up and considered tomorrow. In case the Rules Committee cannot report the rule today, if the minority leader could get his side to agree upon a unanimous consent request to consider that rule tomorrow, so that it would not have to be held over until Friday, he could assure himself of a whole lot more time for debate.

Mr. SNELL. The minority leader does not desire to make such a request. He knows nothing about the rule at the present time. When he is informed about the rule, he will then take a position upon it.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MAY. This may be a proper inquiry and it may not, but would the chairman of the subcommittee care to state at this time the general character of the legislative provisions if it is proper to do so?

Mr. WOODRUM. I have no objection. It is the legislation continuing the economy provisions of the bill with reference to salary restorations. The bill is available, I will say to my colleague, as there is a limited number of copies in the Appropriations Committee room.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does that include a continuation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; it has nothing to do with that.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Do I understand the time is to be equally divided between the two sides?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. I ask that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and myself.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I join in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. While the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] says he is not in a position to make an agreement, I wish to emphasize what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has said, that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] can find it possible to permit this rule to be taken up tomorrow and disposed of, we will have ample time to discuss the proposition which the gentleman refers to, and if we get through with the bill Friday night, it may be possible to adjourn over until Monday and give the Members an opportunity to attend to their business on Saturday. That will afford the fullest opportunity, and it seems to me there could be no good reason for delaying the consideration of the rule 24 hours, because the House now has notice that such rule will doubtless be proposed. The gentleman from New York knows what it will be now, or he will know by the time of the assembling of Congress tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. In answer to the majority leader, I certainly would like to see what the rule provides before I agree to any unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not want the gentleman to make any agreement now, but I am simply telling him what will result if he finds it possible to agree to it. We can have ample debate and get through with the bill on Friday and adjourn over Saturday, possibly.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, I want to ask the majority leader if it is not a fact that the necessity for this rule is to carry out the President's program? If it were not for carrying out the President's program, there would be no necessity for this rule.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICH. We would like to know definitely what this President's program is, if we are going to agree to it.

Mr. BYRNS. That is contained in the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And in the Budget.

Mr. SNELL. This is a pretty broad program, and I do not think we can give any unanimous consent on it until we know what it is. You do not know what the program is and we know nothing about it yet.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Rules I feel justified in saying that the Committee on Rules will be glad to endeavor to bring that rule forward as soon as possible when we are requested to do so. But in connection with the anxiety of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], with reference to the possible provisions of the rule, I think the gentleman can well anticipate what they will be. It will be a controversy, of course, on the program as carried out in this appropriation bill with reference to the recommendations of the President, and in the absence of a rule, points of order would probably lie against those provisions. I do not know what will be requested of the committee, but I assume it will be a simple rule to make that legislation in order despite the rules of the House.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman, who is one of the leaders, does not himself know, how does he expect I am going to know? Furthermore, considering the statement made by the majority leader that we are not going to have legislation by special rules this session, I certainly am still in the dark.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know nothing about that statement by the majority leader, and I doubt very much if the majority leader made that statement.

Mr. SNELL. I read it in the newspapers.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman must not believe everything he reads in the newspapers. I said I hoped it would not be necessary to bring in rules. The gentleman knows we cannot have any session of Congress in which rules are not necessary on occasions.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that is necessary at certain times, but this is the first bill that comes before the House, and you are going to bring it in under a special rule, and I certainly want to know what kind of a rule you are going to propose.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—EMERGENCY FARM CREDIT ACT (H.DOC. NO. 212)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

I have already suggested to the Congress that one of our tasks, in the light of experience, is to improve and perfect previous legislation.

I now recommend that the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1933 be amended to provide responsibility by the Government for the payment of the principal of, as well as interest on, bonds issued.

Two billion dollars of bonds were authorized. While the interest was guaranteed, the ultimate obligation of the Government for payment of the principal was not legally assumed. We should supplement what most of us frankly believe to be the moral responsibility of the Government by adding the necessary legal responsibility. The result of providing a bond on which both the principal and interest are guaranteed would be to put such bonds on a par with Treasury securities.

By setting up a corporation to issue these bonds the important task of refinancing agricultural indebtedness can be continued on virtually a self-sustaining basis.

The Farm Credit Administration is expediting the disbursement of funds. In order that progress in making loans may be uninterrupted, I hope that the Congress will give attention to this subject as soon as possible.

It is true that technically the responsibilities of the Government will be increased by the amount of $2,000,000,000, but it seems in every way right that we thus publicly acknowledge what amounts already to a moral obligation. In any event, the securities to be offered are backed not only by the credit of the Government but also by physical property of very definite value.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—REPORT OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the Eighty-fourth Annual Report of the Board of Directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the independent offices appropriation bill which has just been introduced, and which is now under consideration by the Committee of the Whole, will again be made the vehicle for the economy legislation, or a continuation of those provisions that the President, in his wisdom, feels should be continued during the next fiscal year.

As I stated a few moments ago in the announcement of the committee, so far as I know, the only controversial feature in the bill will be the question relating to the legislative provisions. It will be the purpose of the committee to ask for a rule to make in order on this bill these legislative provisions. I am sorry the committee does not now have printed copies of the bill from which the Members might inform themselves as to these provisions. They have been available to our colleagues on the subcommittee. The bill is being printed and will be available for the committee tomorrow.

I am merely consuming this time while our genial and attractive friend from Texas gets his ammunition together. I see he is now ready to go on.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS]. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the people of this country owe in excess of $230,000,000,000, a large part of which is in tax-exempt bonds, and if all the gold in the world available for monetary purposes, all the gold coin and all gold bullion, was converted into gold dollars containing 23.22 grains, which our dollar contains, there would not be in excess of $12,000,000,000; and if we possessed it all, it would pay off less than 5 percent of the debt. If all the silver in the world available for monetary purposes was converted into silver dollars at a ratio of 16 to 1 with our gold dollar, it would not make in excess of 11 billions of silver dollars. And if we had all the gold and silver in the world available for monetary purposes, it would not pay 10 percent of this debt. Only about 28 percent of the gold of the world is produced in the Americas, while about 82 percent of the silver of the world is produced in the Americas. The United States, Canada, and Mexico produce about 75 percent of the world's supply. The idea of some that silver can be had in abundance is an erroneous one. About 85 percent of the silver is produced as a byproduct of other metals. The exact ratio of the production of silver to gold from 1492 to 1932 was 13.98 to 1, or about 14 to 1, while for the last hundred years the ratio has fallen to 11.4 to 1, or only a minor fraction in excess of 11 to 1. Quoting from Warren and Pearson on Prices:

> The production of silver has come much nearer the production of other things than has the production of gold. Neither gold nor silver nor any other precious metal can be expected to increase at such a rate as to have a stable value. A combination of gold and silver would be much more stable than gold.

Practically all the vast debt now owed by the people of this country was contracted during the 13 years from 1917 to 1929, inclusive. Taking the pre-war wholesale commodity price level as 100, the average wholesale commodity price level during these 13 years was 160. So that the dollar during this period only had a purchasing power of 62½ cents, as compared with the pre-war dollar, while the wholesale commodity price level of 1926 was only 146, taking the pre-war period as 100. So, the purchasing power of the dollar during that year which we propose to take as a standard had a purchasing power of 68½ cents. And surely the creditor should not complain of the purchasing power of the dollar being stabilized at its purchasing power in 1926 when he would still be paid dollars having a greater purchasing power than those he loaned.

Mr. Chairman, a number of countries in Europe, when they returned to the gold standard after the war, greatly devalued their monetary units. For instance, Italy reduced the lira from 290.322 milligrams of fine gold to 79.19 milligrams, or she converted 1 into 3⅗ liras. France reduced her franc from 290.322 milligrams to 58.95 milligrams, or she made 5 francs out of 1. And Belgium reduced the belga from 290.322 milligrams to 41.842 milligrams, or she made 7 out of 1. Thus they did not permit their people to be robbed as we are permitting ours to be. Quoting from Warren and Pearson on Prices:

> It is debts, not wages, that stand in the way of recovery. Little building and limited prosperity can be expected until debts are adjusted to the price level, or the price level reflated to the level at which the debts were contracted. Any kind of an index number would be far more stable than the value of a single commodity. From 1873 to 1896 the value of gold in England almost doubled. From 1896 to 1914 it declined nearly one third. From 1914 to 1920 its value declined more than one half. From 1920 to 1931 it more than doubled.

Mr. Chairman, there is no function of government so vital to a country's welfare and the happiness of its people as that of its currency. Nor can there be any sustained prosperity where the monetary unit is constantly fluctuating, inflating and deflating in purchasing power, any more than the body can be healthy running high and low blood pressure. Nor does the Constitution anywhere place upon Congress half so grave a responsibility as that "to regulate the value of money." "To regulate", that is to stabilize its purchasing power. Theoretically barter furnishes an ideal system of exchange, though such a system in this day and time is impossible. As traffic expanded among ancient, half-civilized peoples and barter became more and more impracticable, they turned to the crude, unscientific system still in use, the injustice from the workings of which has grown with the years. However, science has at last evolved a system that is not only practicable but one which will deal out impartial justice to all.

Mr. Chairman, if prices deny to production a profit, there can be no credit and industry sickens and dies, leaving as a legacy unemployment, want, and revolutionary discontent. Stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar on a price level that will make profits possible and credit will follow as the shadow the substance.

The commodities that feed and clothe, the products that supply the necessities and comforts of men, are as essential today as they were five or a hundred years ago and will continue to be so in the future. And while their prices fluctuate in relation to each other in response to supply and demand, being free from "fiat" and standing alone on intrinsic value, their prices neither inflate nor deflate, though they seem to do so when viewed through the lens of a false exchange medium as the result of the purchasing power of its expanding and contracting monetary unit, which in this country is the dollar. Such a currency is productive of frenzied speculation, and at its rainbow end is bankruptcy and economic chaos. Under the workings of such a currency we have been brought to our present sad plight. For, my colleagues, this unstabilized, deflating, inflating gold dollar has been responsible for every panic that has delivered the people over in mass to be tortured by that cruelest of all demons, "hopeless debt."

Mr. Chairman, let us dispassionately analyze this so-called "gold-standard system." To begin with, gold is just a commodity and not an essential one at that, and subject under the law of supply and demand to fluctuate in price like any other commodity. If you had taken 1 pound of a hundred different commodities that were essential to feed and clothe and to supply the comforts and needs of man and gone out in 1926 to buy or exchange them for dollars, and they bought you $20, and then in 1932 you took a pound of each of the same 100 essential commodities, and they bought you only $5, would it not be patent that the "fiat" nonessential gold-dollar commodity had hijacked you by enormously inflating its exchange price?

Take from it the statutory "fiat" of legislative bodies arbitrarily designating a fixed number of grains of gold as the monetary unit and that "it shall be legal tender for all debts both public and private"; that is, that all debts must be paid in that monetary unit irrespective of its purchasing power on the date of payment, it would not bring as a matter of intrinsic value 25 percent of its statutory "fiat" value. Thus at least 75 percent of our gold dollar is pure legislative "fiat." The injustice constantly being perpetrated by the unstabilized gold dollar was never vividly disclosed until the wholesale commodity price level was evolved. To ascertain a just price level on which the purchasing power of the dollar should be stabilized, we will take the wholesale commodity price level covering any normally prosperous period such as the year 1926. With this period as a standard, the purchasing power of the dollar during that year is accepted to be 100 percent or par. Now, let us see how this gold dollar, in no way stabilized on commodity prices, thereafter acted in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar as shown by the wholesale commodity price level of 1926. In the early part of 1927 its purchasing power began to decline or contract and continued to do so until it had a purchasing power of only 50 cents, so that it took two of these depreciated purchasing-power dollars to equal the purchasing power of one of the dollars during the standard or normal year of 1926. It was these cheap contracted dollars the people erroneously took as meaning high values that started a wild saturnalia of speculation and in a frenzy they went pellmell into debt—States and counties, cities and towns, school and road districts voting bonds and exchanging them for cheap 50-cent purchasing-power dollars. Men mortgaged their homes, their ranches, their farms that they might buy manipulated, worthless stocks.

And then one day in October 1929 this cheap, contracted, treacherous dollar, inflated and balloonlike, shot up from a 50-cent purchasing-power dollar to a 200-cent purchasing-power dollar. So those who bonded and mortgaged and borrowed are being called upon to pay four times in real values what they received. My colleagues, here and only here can this great injustice be righted. Here and only here can the value of money be regulated and the purchasing power of the dollar stabilized. And if it be true that coming events cast their shadows before, it will be done and the long turbulent reign of the unstabilized hijacking gold dollar brought to a close, and "the strong lance of justice will no longer hurtless break because of corruption plated in gold." Aroused by bitter experience, the deliberate judgment of a long suffering people so decrees; and the ghost of a hundred panics rise up to say amen.

With a courageous incorruptible statesman in the White House, the champions of an honest stabilized currency have the opposition on the run, and the security-bond holding groups, through the mouths of henchmen and subsidized economists, are displaying their weakness in attempting to spread a smoke screen of intimidation by hysterically shouting "rubber dollars", "dishonest money", "inflation", "baloney money." What terms could more aptly describe the dollar they attempt to defend? What dollar could be more cruelly dishonest? What dollar could display a greater rubber propensity than one that expands its purchasing power four times overnight, or inflates so quickly with such deadly economic gas?

What better receptacle could be found in which to embalm their spurious arguments so often fraught with filthy slang than that of the baloney casing? Bereft of logic, they stoop to win by an appeal to prejudice; and as if it was a refutation of every argument, parrotlike, they roll under their tongues "brain trust." It ill behooves ignorance to attempt to belittle learning. To do so is to hark back to the Dark Ages when the benighted masses held in contempt the few who could read and write. But with avarice as their banner, they will resort to the use of any weapon that might perchance save the life of the goose that lays for them their eggs. It is the same old, old story of greed fighting progress. Actuated by selfishness the welder of armor, as well as the lordly knight, fought against the introduction of gunpowder that was to make the lowly serf a match in prowess to his haughty master and end his physical bondage, as will the coming of the stabilized dollar end for those who toil in mine, field, and factory their financial bondage. And long, long after the names of those who propaganda against this great reform shall have been forgotten, proud monuments will commemorate and the pages of history will glow with those of Fisher and Brandeis and Warren and Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, the only antidote for the inflated purchasing power of the dollar is to scientifically inflate the volume of currency in circulation, and vice versa, the only antidote for the deflated purchasing power of the dollar is to deflate scientifically the volume of currency in circulation.

Under the terms of the bill introduced by me to accomplish this vital reform, the purchasing power of the dollar as shown by the wholesale commodity price level for the year 1926 is taken as a standard, so that its purchasing power during that period is accepted as being at 100 percent, or par. Then, with this as a standard, this bill provides that whenever the purchasing power of the dollar is more than 2 percent above par, the stabilization board, provided for in the bill and to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Comptroller of the Currency, shall uniformly reduce the rate of income taxes; or, if they deem best, suspend income taxes entirely, while issuing, if necessary, "stabilization coin certificates" and paying all governmental expenses and obligations as they fall due until the purchasing power of the dollar returns to par. And should at any time the purchasing power of the dollar contract and thereby fall as much as 2 percent below par, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting on behalf of the currency stabilization board, is required to withdraw currency from circulation by selling bonds until the purchasing power of the dollar is restored to par. This bill further provides that the gold dollar shall be reduced from 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine to 12.9 grains of gold nine tenths fine, and that the silver dollar shall contain 206.4 grains of silver nine tenths fine. This would establish a ratio of 16 to 1 in the coinage of the two metals. Thus, by restoring silver as money and thereby broadening the metallic base and reducing the number of grains in the gold dollar by half, the Secretary of the Treasury would at all times be in possession of ample redemption metal so that he could expand the currency in circulation sufficiently to keep the purchasing power of the dollar at par with the 1926 wholesale commodity price level.

This bill further provides that all currency certificates of every description now outstanding shall be called in as rapidly as possible and replaced by "stabilization coin certificates", which are to be redeemable in either gold or silver at the option of the currency stabilization board.

Mr. Chairman, enact this bill into law, and never again will wholesale bleary-eyed speculation demoralize the people while manipulative gamblers crucify them through the instrumentality of a corrupt stock exchange. Enact it into law, and never again can the demon of "hopeless debt" convert this country into a mental hell of nerve-shattered anguish while millions shiver and beg for bread in the midst of plenty. Enact it into law, and industry will shake off its lethargy, purchasing power will return, surpluses will vanish, while even-handed justice apportions to every man the fruits of his labor. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am loath to refer to the silver issue. It is one that has been discussed in the House from about 1873 continuously up to 1896, and during that time many eminent members of both parties have expressed their views. Many distinguished Democrats have stated their opinions, including a former President, Grover Cleveland.

I admit that I am fearful of making any statement at the present time about the silver issue, because I do not want to be called a tory or a witch burner or an adherent of Wall Street. Every time a Republican differs with a Democrat he is immediately placed in that category or, even worse, denounced as a defeatist or traitor.

Therefore I do not propose to talk on the silver issue, but I present as my witnesses some well-known Democrats, such as Alfred E. Smith, who recently termed our depreciated currency "baloney" and inflationists and advocates of free silver as "crackpots." No Republican would dare do that because of his fear of being accused of being blindly partisan, and, perhaps, un-American.

Now, let me refer you to Grover Cleveland, who spoke with knowledge on the silver situation when that was a paramount issue. He was a Jeffersonian Democrat, and one of the greatest and one of the most courageous of our Presidents, and always placed the welfare of his country above the partisan or sectional interests of his party.

Let me say to those who advocate free silver that we have done very well so far in the United States without the aid of free silver.

Even in 1928 and 1929, those days that you criticize the Republican Party for, I say to you that, without the aid of free silver, we had the greatest amount of prosperity in America that was ever known, and the trouble with it was that we gave the country an overabundance, a virtual surplus of prosperity, which was abused by the American people, both by Republicans and Democrats, who were stupidly wasteful and extravagant, and gambled and speculated, and made for an enormous inflation, which was bound to collapse of its own weight. The pendulum swung back and did not stop at normalcy, but went on down into the depths of the depression, where we have been for several years. The lack of free coinage of silver had nothing to do with the depression and will not help in getting us out. We can only emerge through the hard work, courage, and faith of the American people in our institutions, backed by sound economic principles and policies. I want to read a few brief statements on the silver question by that former Democratic President, Grover Cleveland, who knew from experience what he was talking about and meant what he said.

> It surely cannot be necessary for me to make a formal expression of my agreement with those who believe that the greatest peril would be invited by the adoption of the scheme embraced in the measure now pending in Congress for the unlimited coinage of silver at our mints.
> If we have developed an unexpected capacity for the assimilation of a largely increased volume of this currency, and even if we have demonstrated the usefulness of such an increase, these conditions fall far short of insuring us against disaster if in the present situation we enter upon the dangerous and reckless experiment of free, unlimited, and independent silver coinage.

I did not rise to speak on the silver question. I rose primarily because the committee in charge wanted to draft someone to speak. But I welcome this opportunity to say a few words. Ever since the Congress met, some of my Democratic friends have been coming to me and saying, "We want a wholesome opposition, we want an active minority and an aggressive militant opposition party." There never was a time in our history when it was more necessary to fight for the preservation of American ideals and institutions from the encroachments of socialistic tendencies and actual State socialism than today.

It is the duty of the Republican Party now in opposition to oppose the undermining of our institutions by further socialistic experiments.

There are plenty of Democratic Members of Congress still taking orders who quietly admit that there are many things going on, many of the methods and policies of their party, that they do not agree with, but cannot oppose, naturally, because of party loyalty—loyalty to the Democratic House organization—and, of course, to say nothing of the plums and patronage which high-minded Members on both sides of the aisle never must take into consideration. I think that attitude represents the viewpoint of a great many Democrats. They want the opposition to take up and discuss and fight those measures they do not believe in, even in the midst of this emergency, and not merely take a complacent and "me, too", attitude.

Mr. Chairman, no one can accuse the Republican Party of trying to block or hinder emergency legislation. It has been the policy of our party since its foundation, in time of war or in time of a great emergency, to support the administration in power. We supported Woodrow Wilson throughout the World War right to the end of the war, until he asked for a Democratic Congress, and then we gave him a Republican Congress. We supported and have supported the N.R.A. from the very beginning. We have made no effort to block it or hinder it or to defeat it, and no one can point the finger of scorn at the Republican Party and say, "You have not done your part." But that does not mean that we approve of everything and all the policies and the methods of the N.R.A. There are many policies and many of its methods that we not only do not approve of but that we are actually opposed to. Particularly, in my section of the country, we do not believe in the plowing of crops underground or in the destruction of crops; we do not believe in the birth control of pigs; we do not believe in Government ownership; we do not believe that the Federal Government should go into buying real estate, building apartment houses, or operating apartment houses; and we do not believe in the control of the great means of disseminating news. We do not believe in the control of the radio; we do not believe in the control of all kinds of business; and, above all, we do not believe in any form of state socialism or in actual socialism.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. In a minute. I should like first to tell a story at this particular juncture, if the gentleman does not mind. The situation today reminds me very much of a story that is supposed to have been told by Abraham Lincoln. He said two men started a fight with their overcoats on, and they fought so hard that they fought themselves into each other's overcoat. It looks to me as if the Democratic Party had fought itself into the Republican overcoat of centralized government and, not stopping there, has gone on away beyond that into state socialism, if not actual socialism.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman from New York mean that the Republican Party has been the party of centralized government?

Mr. FISH. Certainly, the Republican Party has been, as between the two parties in the past. Your party, the party of Thomas Jefferson, the party of individual liberty, the party of State rights, no longer exists. If there is any such party today, it is the Republican Party. Where are those principles of no interference by Government with private industry, or with the rights of the individual, or with individual liberty? Where are the principles of Thomas Jefferson? They have been abandoned and knocked into a cocked hat. You have simply taken over the Republican overcoat, bag and baggage, but, not stopping there, have gone into state socialism.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Are we to infer from your story, the application of which you did not finish, that the Republicans have gotten into the Democratic overcoat?

Mr. FISH. It seems to me now that we more nearly represent the principles of Thomas Jefferson, and I, for one, as a Republican, am proud to do so. [Applause.] I am proud to do so, because you have sacrificed your fundamental principles for Government control, ownership, and a bureaucratic system, if not state socialism, and it might be interesting to both Republicans and Democrats in this House to know that when the Republican Party was founded it stated in its first platform that it was founded on the principles of Thomas Jefferson. Abraham Lincoln said that he took all of his principles from the Declaration of Independence, written by Thomas Jefferson; and those principles, which made your party great for all these years, and which at times we have departed from for centralized government, have been now thrown out of the window, bag and baggage, by your own party under this present administration. What has become of State rights and Jeffersonian Democrats?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the Jeffersonian Republican advise us right now just what he would have done to meet the emergency that confronted the President when he took office last year? The gentleman has told us what he is against. Let us have his views as to how he would have cured the situation. Would he have let things go along as his Republican President did?

Mr. FISH. That is a fair question, and I shall be glad to answer it. I say to you Democrats that if you had gone along the way the Republicans are going along today, in the support of the N.R.A.—if you had gone along just after the depression, when you had a majority in the House, and accepted the sound recommendations of the Republican President at that time, instead of chloroforming them in the committees, instead of throwing them out of the window, the country would have had confidence today, and we would know just where we are going, and we would be on the way out of this depression.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman state what went out of the window?

Mr. FISH. There is one thing that the Democratic Party did, on the recommendation of the then President, Herbert Hoover, and it is today the main vehicle that the Democratic Party relies upon to get us out of the depression more than anything else, and that is the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the most important and necessary piece of legislation passed by Congress since the depression started.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation came into being at the request of a Republican President, and it has loaned 4 billion or more dollars to industry, in return for collateral. It is not the same proposition at all that you propose, namely, to give away money out of the Treasury in the way of doles. I think all the older Members who were in the Congress at that time realize that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had not come into being, and if the Congress had not backed it up and given it these huge sums of money running into billions of dollars, the credit of the country would have collapsed, the railroads would have ceased to operate, insurance companies would have gone bankrupt, and there would have been a total collapse of credit from one end of the country to the other. I give credit to the Members on the Democratic side of the House for accepting a Republican recommendation, carrying it out, and enacting it into law and using it as you are today, to get us out of this depression. But the R.F.C. was no "brain-trust" proposal but the sound economic recommendation of a Republican President in a great emergency.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like the gentleman to make more specific the statements he has just broadly made, that the Democratic side of this House has blocked and killed in committees and thrown out of the window legislation advocated by the Republican Party that would have brought this country back to normal; and his statement just now to the effect of a change of policy of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and if he will explain, if he can, the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in making loans to Charley Dawes and his crowd?

Mr. FISH. Well, that is a very fair question, and I will answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. GOSS. I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman and his colleagues to the fact that his party was elected on a platform not only of sound money, that was discussed previously, but upon a platform of economy and balancing the Budget. The Republican administration was sincere in its efforts to balance the Budget. It presented to the House a sales tax, which is the only possible means that I know of left to raise further revenue, and it is inevitable and you must come to it. The former administration proposed, and was backed up by most of the Republicans at that time, to balance the Budget by a 2-percent sales tax. That was thrown out of the window by the Democrats in the House of Representatives. After all, balancing the Budget was probably at that time, and may still be today, the most important issue before the country and the only thing that is going to restore confidence in business and among the American people who have any money left.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. When did the former President advocate a sales tax?

Mr. FISH. About a year and a half ago, before he went out of office; and the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the President.

Mr. FIESINGER. Did he not make the statement just on the eve of the passage of the tax bill in the Senate, when the Senate had agreed to pass a tax bill, and he made no other utterances about the sales tax?

Mr. FISH. The Secretary of the Treasury speaks for him. I cannot recollect the specific words of the President.

Mr. FIESINGER. Another question. The gentleman has stated that the Republican Party was not in favor of putting the Government in business. What did it do with reference to the Farm Board and the farmer?

Mr. FISH. Oh, we tried a few experiments ourselves, and they were disastrous, just like your experiments. [Laughter.]

Now, if you do not mind, I will turn from discussing partisan issues as I should like to say a few words in the time that remains about some other matters that I had intended to speak about in the first instance. However, before doing so, I would say this: I understand that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill may be reported out and come up before the House, for a continuation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, tomorrow or the day after, whenever the Democrats so decide. I am talking out of turn, because I do not know the attitude of my party, and I do not know the attitude of my leader, but all I can say is that I am in favor of the extension of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 1 year. I am in favor of giving the R.F.C. a billion dollars, if necessary, and from what I read in the papers today I do not think enough money was provided for the so-called "mortgage loans." Only $75,000,000 was provided for mortgage loans. I suppose you Democrats are in exactly the same boat as we are on our side. I know that a lot of legitimate industries in my district, old-time industries, 50 or 60 years old, cannot borrow money from banks and are unable to get loans to keep going and to keep men employed, and they are entitled to obtain credit from the R.F.C. on collateral which can only make loans through mortgage companies. Those legitimate business interests, employing innumerable men and women, cannot get it from the Government if we only provide $75,000,000 for that purpose. I should say $500,000,000 was needed at the present time. This money is loaned on collateral, and that is a far different principle than giving it away. I should be glad to vote for $500,000,000 instead of $75,000,000, if we get an opportunity tomorrow.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Does the gentleman favor direct loans to industry? The gentleman stated it was almost impossible to arrange loans through banks, and in many instances through mortgage-loan companies. Does the gentleman favor direct loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to industry?

Mr. FISH. I can only answer the gentleman by saying if the loans were restricted and properly safeguarded, then I might favor it; but I understand Mr. Jesse Jones has not advocated it, and I rather think it will not go through unless the Directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation come down here and make some claim for it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. I think there is a great deal in what the gentleman has to say about the real necessity for industry at this time to get some money on loans. Does the gentleman not believe that the sooner we make direct loans the better it will be for business recovery?

Mr. FISH. I believe it can be done, but it must be rigidly and conservatively restricted. That is the point. But if you cannot do it and do not propose to do it, let us do it the way we are trying, through the mortgage companies, but give the R.F.C. a sufficient amount of money to lend on collateral to industrial companies to weather the emergency.

Mr. McKEOWN. I agree with the gentleman that something must be done to take care of these industries, because the banks are going to lose all of their business, inasmuch as they do not take care of either the farmers or industry.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further at this point?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman favor opening up to all business the right to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation without limit?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think $1,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 enough to meet the needs of industry?

Mr. FISH. No. I do not even know that we can enact legislation drastic enough to carry out any such proposal. However, in view of all the existing circumstances let us appropriate sufficient money to relieve legitimate industry through mortgage companies.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman made a statement about silver. Does the gentleman care to state the position of the Republican Party on the silver question?

Mr. FISH. I can state only my individual views, but I think they are the views of the people in New York State, and the East generally. I cannot say it is the position of the President of the United States, who is one of my constituents, or perhaps I am one of his, but he comes from my congressional district. I can, at least, state my own views and what I think are the views of the Republicans generally in the State of New York. I am glad the gentleman has asked this question, because there has been much misinformation on the currency issue. Everybody accuses everybody else of being an inflationist because the dollar has gone down to 65 cents. That is not a true picture. What is causing fear and uncertainty throughout the land is that the commodity dollar will go lower.

I think the Republicans in the State of New York would be satisfied if the dollar were stabilized at 66⅔ cents and the gold standard restored. But if you are going to continue with the fluctuating or commodity dollar, you will destroy confidence among the business interests in our section of the United States. I think this is the whole trouble with business today—utter lack of confidence in a fluctuating or commodity dollar which depends upon weather conditions in the far West, the Middle West, the South, and even in Canada. If you accepted a stabilized dollar at 66⅔ cents, or at 65 cents, I think the business interests of America would be satisfied. But if you are going to continue this fluctuating dollar, you will never restore confidence. If you do what many Members of Congress want done and cut the dollar down to 35 cents, you will destroy all confidence in the eastern section of the United States.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. He said something about silver, raising up sort of a scarecrow, the old 16-to-1 proposition. Has the gentleman ever considered treating silver in any way except on a fixed ratio? Does the gentleman mean to infer he is against all proposals with reference to silver being made a part of the monetary reserve without a fixed ratio?

Mr. FISH. No. I think as soon as we get around to some international agreement on silver, that will be acceptable.

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the gentleman think this can be done by the United States alone?

Mr. FISH. No; an international agreement will have to be made with other nations. It would have to be with the great nations of the world. When they reach an international agreement on silver it will probably be acceptable to our party. It has been in the past. I do not know why it should not be in the future.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman has not given me a very satisfactory answer on the proposition.

Mr. FISH. I have but a few minutes left, and even in the beginning I did not intend to take all my time talking on the silver issue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me 5 additional minutes?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman believe that four fifths of the world is doing business on silver?

Mr. FISH. I think if that were the fact we could arrange an international agreement on silver very easily.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about a proposal which, according to the press, will come from the White House either today or tomorrow, advocating and urging the ratification of the St. Lawrence ship canal. I think it only right that some of us Members of Congress from New York, Mr. MEAD, myself, and others, should present to the Members of the House their views on this situation which affects our State very seriously.

I would remind you that the State of New York pays 30 percent of the Federal taxes. It is now proposed, if this treaty is carried out, to build a canal in a foreign country for the purpose of diverting trade and commerce from the ports of New York, Albany, Buffalo, and Syracuse, to say nothing of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk and other great eastern and southern seaports, at the expense of the taxpayers, very largely, of the State of New York.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. In a little while, after I have made my statement.

If the proposed St. Lawrence ship canal would actually benefit the farmers of the West and give them cheaper freight rates, it might be a serious matter to discuss even in the State of New York, but the St. Lawrence Canal has become a political football and is a political myth. It will not benefit any western farmer 1 cent a bushel on the export or shipment of his wheat from Minnesota, Wisconsin, or farther west to the eastern seaboard or to London. For years these farmers have been told they would save 10 cents a bushel on the freight rate on their wheat. They have been so persistently propagandized that it has become a political issue. The fact is, however, that the freight rate at the present time is only 4 cents and they will not save anything at all.

We in New York are not raising an awful howl because we pay 30 percent of the taxes to destroy crops in the West or to pay for the birth control of hogs, or pay for farm relief generally, but when it comes to diverting trade from the city of New York, and the Hudson River and up-State cities at the expense of our own taxpayers, and then spend that money in a foreign country, our people do object and protest vigorously. I am opposed to spending any money in any foreign country, whether it be Canada, England, Germany, or Soviet Russia. The St. Lawrence ship canal is an economic imbecility and a fraud upon the farmers of the West and the consumers of the East.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman does not seriously contend that the State of New York is 30 percent of the processing tax, does he?

Mr. FISH. No; not that.

Mr. PATMAN. That is the source of the money used to take care of the crop-reduction program.

Mr. FISH. Not any particular crop.

Mr. PATMAN. What crop does the gentleman from New York refer to?

Mr. FISH. I am referring to Federal expenditures.

Mr. PATMAN. I wish the gentleman from New York would name one crop in regard to which the State of New York pays 30 percent of the processing tax.

Mr. FISH. I am not discussing the processing taxes, but all possible taxes.

Mr. PATMAN. Not every possible way; just name one.

Mr. FISH. I am talking about Federal taxes generally.

Mr. PATMAN. But the gentleman said crop reduction and the cutting down of hog production.

Mr. FISH. It does not make any difference, as the consumers in the East will have to pay the bill anyway for the increased cost of western foodstuffs, whether by taxes or by high cost of living.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Where do you suppose a great deal of the income, upon which the people of the State of New York pays income tax, comes from?

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman realizes that we do pay out huge sums and have been paying out huge sums for relief purposes in your State, probably far more than your State gives into the Federal Treasury. But we are not raising that issue. We raise the issue today merely that the St. Lawrence Canal will not benefit your farmers, that you made a political football out of it and it will not benefit them one cent. On the other hand, it will take trade and commerce from the eastern and southern seaboards, where 30,000,000 consumers and the same number of wage earners will be the losers, and will not benefit the farmers one cent. Because you made the St. Lawrence ocean ship canal a political football and because it is a political myth, you western Members have to go along and say: "We cannot go back on our promise. This is the way to afford relief to the farmers."

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman contend that support of the St. Lawrence waterway is any more of a political football in the Middle West than the opposition to it in certain parts of the State of New York?

Mr. FISH. Yes, I do; because you can do actual harm, you can destroy the trade of the eastern and southern seaports and particularly the port of New York, and it cannot benefit your people. If it could benefit your people it would be a different matter, and I would be willing to discuss the merits of the proposition; but as it is, why spend American dollars in Canada to ruin the shipping interests of the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FIESINGER. A gentleman on this side calls my attention to the fact that the gentleman from New York made the statement in colloquy here that there were some Members on this side of the aisle who were in favor of 35-cent dollars. Will the gentleman, if he did make that statement, put into the RECORD who those gentlemen are?

Mr. FISH. No; certainly not. I would not think of putting it in the RECORD. I have heard individual opinions expressed as to the dollar going down lower than that. I am opposed to the dollar going down below what it is today. I know that the Congress has authorized the President to devalue the dollar to 50 cents. It has not reached that point as yet. I will not cross that bridge until I get there. I will tell you what the gentlemen on this side want. We want to stabilize the dollar at 66⅔ cents, and certainly not below 60 cents.

Mr. FIESINGER. We want to stabilize it, too.

Mr. FISH. If Congress will stabilize the dollar, confidence will be restored in America overnight.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PATMAN. I understood the gentleman to make the statement that there are Members in this House advocating a 35-cent dollar. Was that statement made?

Mr. FISH. If those were my words, then, of course, your statement is correct.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman was really mistaken about that?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman name those Members?

Mr. FISH. I certainly will not. They advocated that openly, but in a personal conversation off the floor of the House.

Mr. PATMAN. Name the Members who are advocating the 35-cent dollar.

Mr. FISH. I am not going to embarrass the gentleman. I will say that some Senators of the United States also made similar statements.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman mean in the other body?

Mr. FISH. Yes; in both bodies. There are Senators of the United States advocating 35-cent dollars among their friends. However, they can speak for themselves, but I hope that they will see the light beforehand.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman cannot name a single one?

Mr. FISH. I certainly can name them, but I do not propose to do it now. The Republicans are fearful it will go below that if some of the inflationists among the Democrats have their way.

Mr. PATMAN. How much below that?

Mr. FISH. I will not name that figure, either, except to say one of the older Republican Members of the House, who detests the rubber dollar, predicts the dollar will go to 20 cents.

Mr. MAY. When I left the Chamber a few minutes ago I understood the gentleman from New York was taking exception to the attitude of the Democratic majority in departing from the principles of Jefferson and generally violating the Constitution of the United States. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he agrees with the noted and distinguished Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, who was Republican nominee for President in 1916, on the question of the adaptability of the Constitution of the United States to present conditions?

Mr. FISH. I am in entire accord with that opinion, and I think it is absolutely necessary, both in emergencies and in war. I am glad the Supreme Court has decided that the Constitution has that elasticity, and I do not think we are sacrificing anything, either. I hope we will return, however, to peaceful and prosperous days when the Constitution will be construed normally.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman mentioned the contribution of the State of New York to the cost of the building of the St. Lawrence Canal. Has the gentleman made an investigation as to the contributions made by the people of the Middle West during the last three quarters of a century to the development of the various ports and waterways of the State of New York?

Mr. FISH. I cannot give you the figures.

Mr. FIESINGER. Is the gentleman in position to give us comparative figures as to your contribution to the waterways as against our contributions?

Mr. FISH. Oh, certainly. In the State of New York which you refer to, the Federal contributions have not been very large toward our waterways.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. We have been spending money on your waterways for a half century or more.

Mr. FISH. I know all about that. If the gentleman refers to the Eastern States, that is a different thing. The Federal Government has not spent very much money in our particular State, because we only have the Hudson River. The Hudson River is navigable for 150 miles and it does not need Federal appropriation except for the last 10 miles, for which the sum of $10,000,000 was appropriated a few years ago.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I propose to put in the RECORD a statement of the appropriations of Federal money that have been made toward the development of the harbor of New York and other eastern seaports, together with a comparative statement showing the amount of Federal money that has gone into the development of the waterways of the interior.

Mr. FISH. That is your privilege.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. With regard to the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, does the gentleman know that that was a decision on the constitution of the State of Minnesota and not a decision on the Constitution of the United States? It was the State of Minnesota that passed this moratorium law.

Mr. FISH. Well, it was a proper decision in this emergency and the Court took the broad attitude that the public welfare predominates in an emergency. It is a very broad and constructive decision and, for one, I think, a proper construction of the Constitution supported by three eminent Republicans. The Republican Party is not at all in sympathy with having all the emergency legislation made permanent. We look forward to the day when a good part of this legislation will be wiped out when the emergency is over and we will get back to the Constitution and to our American institutions, now temporarily loaded down with unsound and socialistic experiments.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The point I wanted to make is that the Farmer-Labor Party is very proud that they have blazed the way and the Supreme Court of the United States has placed its stamp of approval upon it.

Mr. FISH. There will not be any Farmer-Labor Party left when we get through with it next year. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is going to be very easy for me to agree with my distinguished colleague from New York on the question of the St. Lawrence waterway, but because of my loyalty to the principles of the party of Thomas Jefferson, it is going to be most difficult for me to agree with the statement he made with regard to changes in our party principles. So I will have to agree with some parts and disagree violently with other parts of his address.

When the gentleman talks about the philosophy contained in the N.R.A. and the new emergency set-ups of government and the fact that my party is drifting away from the time-honored traditions of our great founder, let me remind him that in the days of Thomas Jefferson it was his eager desire to bring the protective influence of government down into the hovels and homes and to the firesides of America. He saw in government an instrumentality for the protection of the poor and the weak, and in keeping with this philosophy, the great student of Jeffersonian principles who now guides the destinies of this country in the White House is bringing the full protection of government to the masses and applying it in the same way as did Thomas Jefferson in his day. It is the weak, it is the workers, it is the farmers of the country who make it necessary for the Democratic Party to adopt the principles contained in the N.R.A.

Let me say to the gentleman that the day is past when we will be guided longer by that theory which the Republican Party has been expounding in recent years, that of rugged individualism in a machine age; the theory of less government in business and more business in government in an age of stock speculation and bank swindling, in an age when big business drives small business out of existence. It is these elements and influences which are looking to their own selfish ends and, of course, they are shouting for less Government restriction or interference.

There is a difference in the condition of the Thirteen Original Colonies of Jefferson's time and the 48 States of Roosevelt's day. The Democratic Party is keeping faith with the masses of the people and representing them and protecting them, and we are not going back to the uncontrolled system which the Republican Party would like to espouse at this time, and we are not going to the extreme left and adopt State socialism or government ownership. We are going to accept and support the reforms included in the emergency legislation which has been adopted, and by these reforms we are going to see to it that the masses of our people have the right and the opportunity which a democratic government should bestow upon its people.

We are going to add to the constitutional right of life and liberty the right to work, and this is a right which did not seem to worry the last Republican administration, and this is why the Democratic Party is in power. For this reason we are not going to deviate to the right nor the left, but we are going to make a success of the new economic philosophy, and we are going to see to it that the sunshine of a new day comes to the American worker and the American farmer. [Applause.]

I may say to my distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] that the blue eagle, the symbol of the N.R.A., is here to stay, and we will have codes of fair competition in every State of the Union and in every industry in America. Yes; we will have them in every nation of the earth, because I believe that we have selected the very best economic system of any nation on earth. We retain all that is good in private business and we shun all that is evil in State ownership.

Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, this system is here to stay. The country will never tolerate a return to the much-heralded rugged individualism or the theory of less government in business and more business in government. We are going on with the new deal until it becomes universally recognized, not only in America but all over the world. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not want to distract the gentleman's attention, because he is making an excellent speech, but in speaking a few minutes ago did I understand the gentleman to say "rugged" or "ragged" individualism?

Mr. MEAD. Well, it was rugged individualism, but by reason of the way it was applied by reason of the lack of interest in the individual under 12 years of Republican administration the rugged individual became a ragged individual. [Laughter.] Then the Democratic Party came to his support.

I desire now to agree with my distinguished colleague from New York, and it is a pleasure for me to go along with him with regard to this particular subject. The gentleman from New York, in his speech, said something about the St. Lawrence waterway and its effect upon the country, as well as its effect upon the great State of New York. Someone in the course of the gentleman's remarks made an observation with regard to the contributions made to the waterways of the State of New York by the United States as well as by other States. I may say to you that the State of New York has the best system of inland waterways of any State in the Union, and the State government paid for that system with its own money and without outside help.

I want to say further that we are spending more money on our waterways than any other State in the Union. We are happy to contribute to the waterways in your State, but we are violently opposed to the contribution of American money to build a canal in foreign territory.

Now, I want to say something to you about how it will affect labor, and the mining interests of the country. In order to be accurate I have jotted down some of my ideas on this subject.

Under the terms of the St. Lawrence Treaty all funds supplied by the United States and expended for work in Canadian territory must be utilized in the employment of Canadian labor, Canadian engineers, and Canadian materials. The report of the engineers, upon which the treaty is based, estimates that $55,000,000 of American money will be expended upon canal works in Canadian territory. Judging from the amount by which the cost of the Panama Canal and the cost of the Welland Canal exceeded the engineering estimates, more than $100,000,000 of American money will go to Canadian labor and Canadian engineers. That Canada was on the job protecting the interests of her labor at the time the treaty was written is shown by the following editorial, dealing with the St. Lawrence Treaty, which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire on July 18, 1932, immediately after the treaty was signed.

CANADIAN LABOR AND MATERIALS

Most of the construction work will done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used.

Approximately 80 percent of the cost of waterway improvements go to labor. With millions of men out of work in the United States how can our Government justify the expenditure of so vast a sum of American money for Canadian labor?

COAL-MINE LABOR

Canada has served as a valuable market for American coal. The Canadian market, in recent years, has consumed approximately 17,000,000 tons of American coal annually. Canada was formerly a valuable market for Americn anthracite. With only a 14-foot channel now available down the St. Lawrence we are losing our Canadian anthracite market to Great Britain. In 1930 Canada consumed 996,112 tons of British anthracite and 2,955,954 tons of American anthracite. In 1932 Canada consumed 1,399,086 tons of British anthracite and 1,695,532 tons of American anthracite. Thus far this year Canada has imported more anthracite from Great Britain than from the United States.

The St. Lawrence Treaty provides for a 27-foot seaway from all the ports on the Great Lakes down the St. Lawrence and out to the sea. Port Arthur, on the north shore of Lake Superior, is adjacent to the wheat fields of Canada, and more wheat now passes through that port than any other port in the world. When a 27-foot seaway becomes available foreign-flag ships, manned by cheap foreign labor, will transport Canadian wheat to the world markets at Liverpool and other European ports, and for want of return cargo these foreign ships will carry British coal into the Great Lakes as ballast without regard to remunerative rates. British mines are unionized, which affords some guarantee to the American miner, but if the cost of transporting British coal into Canada is practically eliminated, our Canadian market for 17,000,000 tons of coal annually will soon disappear.

The National Congress of Geologists in 1913 reported that Russian coal resources amounted to 231,460,000,000 tons, of which 55,600,000,000 tons is located in the Donetz Basin near the Black Sea, and that 37,599,000,000 tons of this amount consists of a high quality of anthracite. Russian geologists more recently have reported that the coal resources of Russia amount to 428,300,000,000 tons, of which 54,100,000,000 tons are anthracite.

In order to visualize the enormity of the Russian coal deposits it is well to know that Pennsylvania anthracite resources in 1913 were estimated at 16,906,000,000 tons while those of Wales were estimated at 8,685,000,000 tons.

The Coal Section of the Minerals Division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Washington, reports that approximately 150,000 persons are employed in the coal mines of the Donetz Basin and that coal-cutting machines are being rapidly installed in these mines. The Economic Review of the Soviet Union reports that their coal-production schedule has been set to increase at the rate of 4,000,000 tons annually for a period of 10 years, at the end of which time the annual production is expected to reach 70,000,000 tons. Official records in Washington show that 201,113 tons of Donetz Basin anthracite was imported into the United States in 1932 and 103,073 tons during the first 6 months of 1933, and the coal experts advise that an analysis shows that Russian anthracite is of a much better quality than either Welsh or Pennsylvania anthracite.

A 27-foot channel from all the Great Lakes ports down the St. Lawrence will provide low-cost water transportation and will open up enormous markets for Canadian products in the ports of the Mediterranean and Black Sea. When the St. Lawrence is completed Canada will have an unlimited supply of the cheapest power in the world which will enable her to build industries on the banks of a sea-going canal. Canada's liberal immigration laws will permit these industries to operate with cheap labor. With cheap labor and cheap power and industries on a sea-going canal Canadian products will compete in the markets of the Mediterranean and the Black Sea.

The Russian coal mines now being rapidly developed in the Donetz Basin are only 100 miles from the Black Sea. Thus, when the St. Lawrence seaway is completed and Canadian products of various kinds begin to develop markets around the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, high-grade Russian anthracite and other Russian coal will be available as return cargoes and for want of other cargo foreign-flag ships will carry this coal into the Great Lakes as ballast with little thought of remunerative rates.

Not only will this destroy the existing Canadian market for American coal—it will jeopardize such markets as Superior, Duluth, Milwaukee, Chicago, East Chicago, Gary, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and many other cities on the American side of the Great Lakes. This would seriously threaten the coal industry of the United States. Russian coal mines are owned by the Soviet Government. That Government is not disturbed about the wages of its miners, and it will be a difficult problem for labor in American mines to compete with miners who work under the Russian system.

RAILWAY LABOR

American coal, now transported to the Canadian market, as well as American coal transported to American cities around the Great Lakes, constitutes a very substantial tonnage for the railroads. If Russian coal, mined by Russian labor, can be transported as ballast to Canadian ports and to Great Lakes cities on the American side, it will destroy these markets for American coal. This will eliminate a substantial amount of tonnage now carried by American railroads and will thereby deprive a large number of American railway workers of employment.

Now, what is going to happen? It does not make any difference to the Soviet Government what wages they pay miners. They have little concern about that. They will see that the ships are returned to the Great Lakes loaded down with Russian coal, mined by Russian labor, to the great detriment of our coal industry.

That Canada was fully conscious of these possibilities is indicated by another paragraph in the editorial of the Toronto Mail and Empire, which reads as follows:

GREAT ST. LAWRENCE INDUSTRIAL REGION

It is probably not going too far to predict that with this new canal and power development on the St. Lawrence River, with little cost to Canada, the Great Lakes region and St. Lawrence Valley will, in the next few years, be lifted into a place of industrial leadership.

What about the American seamen? We boast that by reason of the passage of the La Follette Seamen's Act the American sailor stands out as the only 100 percent free man that sails the sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. We are going to destroy the effectiveness of that act, because the only American waters wherein the high standards prescribed by the La Follette Seamen's Act, wherein the American seaman does not have to compete with the oriental of the east, or with cheap European labor, the only place where we now enjoy unexcelled opportunity to develop an American merchant marine, is the Great Lakes, and it is now proposed to open up those waters to the traffic of the world, to the tramp steamers of every nation on earth, and to sink to the very lowest the high standards of American workers that now find employment on these lakes. Let me say to you, my friends, before you give away an American lake—and there is in this treaty an agreement to internationalize Lake Michigan, which is now our lake—before you give away an American lake and in return build a canal in a foreign country over which you will have little control or jurisdiction, think of the damage that may result to American shipping, to American railroad interests, to the American worker, and to the American farmer.

Just listen to this, please.

AMERICAN SEAMEN

The La Follette Seamen's Act was passed by Congress for the purpose of insuring a fair wage and decent living conditions for American seamen in the merchant marine. If a 27-foot seaway is constructed from the Great Lakes ports down the St. Lawrence to the sea, foreign-flag ships will be free to engage in commerce between all the Great Lakes cities, on the one hand, and Cuba, Mexico, Central and South America on the other. What chance has an American-flag ship, paying the American wage scale and maintaining American standards of living, to compete in commerce with ships flying the flags of Japan, China, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, Germany, France, and Italy? What chance have American seamen, under such conditions, to compete with such foreign labor? Furthermore, foreign-flag ships, manned by cheap foreign labor, will be free to come into the Lakes and engage in commerce between all the ports on the American side and ports on the Canadian side. This means ruin for American labor now employed upon the Great Lakes.

THE AMERICAN FARMER

The St. Lawrence Treaty, if ratified in its present form, will reduce the diversion at Chicago to a point which will make a commercially useful Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway impossible. The seaway proposed by this treaty will provide cheap transportation from the Canadian wheat fields to the world markets and will place the American farmer in such States as South Dakota, Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Oklahoma in a position where he cannot compete with Canadian wheat in the markets of Europe and the Mediterranean ports.

The water rate on wheat from Chicago to Liverpool through the New York barge canal is now 9.9 cents per bushel, or 16.5 cents per 100 pounds. The proponents of the St. Lawrence Treaty insist that this rate will be substantially reduced when a 27-foot seaway becomes available from the Great Lakes ports down the St. Lawrence, and to justify the vast expenditure proposed upon this seaway this improvement should insure a rate of less than 16 cents per 100 pounds from the great Canadian wheat port to Liverpool. If you shut off a Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, how can the American wheat farmer compete with the Canadian farmer in the markets of Europe when the rail rate on wheat from Pierre, S.Dak., to Duluth is 34.5 cents per 100 pounds; from Lincoln, Nebr., to Chicago, 28.5 cents per 100 pounds; and from Topeka, Kans., to Chicago, 29.5 cents per 100 pounds? It will cost the American wheat farmer more than twice as much to transport his wheat to a Lake port as it will for the Canadian farmer to transport his wheat from the Lake ports to the world market. This presents a serious problem for the man who works on the American farm.

In the face of these facts, can it be said that the St. Lawrence seaway will benefit American labor? On the contrary, will it not distinctly jeopardize the American coal miner, the American railway worker, and the American farmer? When so large a part of American labor is made to suffer, the whole working class of the Nation will feel the shock. It would seem the part of wisdom that American labor should study the proposed St. Lawrence Treaty and make sure whether its interests are protected before it is too late.

You can see that by touching American and Canadian lake ports and then touching again at Central and South American ports, ships are not in violation of our coastwise law, because they are touching on a foreign country before departing from the Great Lakes, you, therefore, destroy that protection which has been a real protection to the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I agree with the first part of the Congressman's speech, but I cannot agree with what he said later on. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I think he will agree with me, that we are landlocked up there in the great Northwest that I happen to represent in Congress. And I want also to ask him this. He does not mean to say that he would like to treat the States up there as stepchildren, compared with the rest of the States in this Union.

Mr. MEAD. I shall be very glad to answer the gentleman, who is now a colleague of mine on the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. I do not want to interfere with the progress of any State or section of the country. I merely call attention to the fact that if you open up this seaway in order that you may gain access to a certain portion of the markets of the world, you are destroying the best market on earth for the American farmers of the Northwest. Let me remind my friend that the State of New York, prosperous and employed, is a better market for the United States products than all of South America. You believe, by constructing this canal, that you might sell your wheat abroad. I am trying to safeguard for you the best market on earth for the American farmer, and that market is right here in our own country. I am willing to build canals and waterways with American money, but not when the economics indicate that it is to the eternal damage of our country.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. First I want to answer my distinguished colleague from New York, the only Member of Congress from my State who is for the St. Lawrence waterway, because it runs through his district.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is right; I am for it and for a very good reason. I know something about the whole proposition.

Mr. MEAD. That is a good reason.

Mr. SNELL. Which I shall explain to the House in a few days, when I shall answer some of the statements that the gentleman has made. The gentleman says that under the provisions of this treaty we would give away a lake.

Will the gentleman tell me what provision there is in the treaty by which we give away anything like a lake?

Mr. MEAD. Perhaps in order to gain some added emphasis I am guilty of using words that ought to be changed. If I were to change them I would say that today Lake Michigan belongs to the United States and by the treaty it becomes an international body of water, and if I had my way it would belong to the United States and never become internationalized.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman and I are agreed upon that.

Mr. MEAD. But in the treaty, by virtue of an agreement, made by the United States Commissioners—and those Comsioners, in my judgment, were attempting to synchronize their opinions with the opinion of the then President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, who was for the canal—the Commission decided that Lake Michigan would be internationalized, and by that decree I say we lose our exclusive ownership of Lake Michigan, and I am against that proposition.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I think I am correct in saying there is not one privilege given to the Canadian Government that they do not enjoy today. They have rights in navigation on Lake Michigan at the present time. They will only have rights of navigation under the treaty. We have all the rights of ownership and policing just exactly the same as we have now. As a matter of cold fact, we are not giving away a single right under the treaty.

Mr. MEAD. That is the gentleman's theory.

Mr. SNELL. I say that is borne out by the treaty.

Mr. MEAD. But I say that we have certain rights which from time to time we enjoy.

Mr. SNELL. I ask the gentleman to name one that we have given away.

Mr. MEAD. Whenever the Canadian ministry decides that it will prescribe certain preferential tariffs in their favor and in opposition to us, overnight those privileges are taken away from us. But in this treaty we give to Canada, in perpetuity, privileges that may now be granted only temporarily and from time to time. By this treaty I maintain we grant to Canada permanent privileges which are not now enjoyed by Canada.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. If I am correct, and I think I am, for I have studied the treaty some, there is not a single right granted to Canada that they have not enjoyed ever since the institution of this Government; not a single individual right on that lake that they do not have now.

Mr. MEAD. I have studied the treaty——

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman cannot name one right that they are given.

Mr. MEAD. I have read statements made by distinguished gentlemen all over the country, even by the distinguished Speaker of this House, in which he condemned that part of the treaty which internationalized Lake Michigan. And if the gentleman has read the treaty, and if after he read it he cannot find where we are giving Canada anything, then I am going to say to him that I differ with him, because I, too, have read the treaty, and I say it is a big bargain for Canada and no bargain at all for the United States. In fact, we are playing Santa Claus. That is the interpretation I have of the treaty.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman just cite one instance? I have read the treaty. Will the gentleman just cite one instance in the treaty from start to finish where we are giving Canada anything? The gentleman has made a lot of general statements.

Mr. MEAD. For the last 15 or 20 minutes I have been trying to convey to the gentleman and to the Members of this House the fact that we give away more than we are receiving, and I shall be very glad, if the gentleman has read the treaty and cannot find where we are giving away anything, to sit down with him and go over it, and perhaps in that way I may be able to point out wherein we differ.

Mr. SNELL. It is a very easy thing to get up here and make general statements that we are giving away a great many things.

Mr. MEAD. That is all the gentleman is doing—making another general statement. I want to say to the gentleman that he is absolutely in error, because we are giving away more than we are receiving.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is still in error, because we are not giving away more than we receive, and the treaty will bear me out.

Mr. MEAD. I am very sorry we have to differ.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has made a number of general statements, but he cannot answer as to the specific facts in the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MEAD. I want, in an orderly manner, to answer my distinguished colleague, one whom I admire and respect very much, and one who differs with the rest of his colleagues from New York because he is the representative, as I stated before, of a district where the only 10 percent of canalization that is going to be in the United States touches. Let me say to the gentleman that recently some 500 upstanding men, many of them distinguished Republicans, representing New England, the Middle Atlantic, Southern, and Gulf States, met in the city of Philadelphia, and among them was a former Member of this body, the present mayor of the city of Philadelphia, Hon. J. Hampton Moore. Those 500 men, coming from these great States, made the following statement and included it in resolutions that were adopted by that body. This, in my judgment, will answer the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. Talking about the treaty, these delegates made the following statement:

> It proposes the construction of a new deep waterway route, 90 percent of which lies in Canada, and construction of hydroelectric power plants, 80 percent of which will reside in and belong to Canada; to internationalize Lake Michigan, now entirely an American lake, and to surrender our sovereignty over it; to have the United States advance, in the first instance, all costs; to allow Canada to deduct from her share of the expense the amount of her expenditures for waterway improvements heretofore made in Canada—

We are going to credit Canada with the money which Canada has spent in the improvement of her waterways.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Not until I finish this statement. They continue:

> and denies to the United States similar credits for practically all moneys expended in American territory; provides that all improvements made in Canada (80 to 90 percent) shall be made with Canadian labor, Canadian materials, and by Canadian engineers—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] has again expired.

Mr. MEAD. Can you not see that Canada is getting a little the best of it?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MEAD (continuing)— > favors the position of the Canadian wheat exporter in his keen competition with the American wheat farmer, who is already handicapped by British preferential tariffs; provides the means to divert the Great Lakes traffic which now finds its way to the Atlantic and the Gulf through American waterways and over American railroads to Canadian ports by means of Canadian transportation facilities, all to the injury and destruction of our own rail and waterway transportation facilities and to the injury also of American investors in our transportation enterprises and terminals.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. In just a minute.

Mr. Chairman, these 500 delegates attending the Philadelphia conference, representing the sentiment of many States, pointed out the losses we would suffer by accepting the treaty as it now stands. I recommend an economic survey before we adopt this treaty, and I also recommend a congressional investigation of the activity of the Tidewater Association, which has been so instrumental in spreading propaganda around the country.

I now yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to say we were to pay a larger portion of the construction of this seaway than Canada and that we were not to get credit for anything we had heretofore done.

Mr. MEAD. This resolution states that we receive very little credit.

Mr. SNELL. I know that is what the resolution states. As a matter of absolute fact, however—and this I think cannot be disputed—every dollar that is spent on this seaway from Duluth to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, a distance of 1,667 miles, is to be provided one half by Canada and one half by the United States. On the other hand, where the United States has already put money into the development of this seaway, she gets credit for it. Where the Canadians have put money in they get credit for it. Is not this a fair proposition?

Mr. MEAD. If the proposition were as stated by the gentleman from New York it would be, but I think he has misunderstood it.

Mr. SNELL. I do not believe my statement can be successfully contradicted. It is an entirely fair and absolutely accurate statement of facts.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I heard the direct opposite of his statement reiterated with greater emphasis.

Mr. SNELL. I am discussing facts, not making an argument.

Mr. MEAD. In the matter of the allocation of credits, I still maintain the American Government is the loser; I still maintain we suffer a financial loss. I feel that the Toronto Mail and Empire was correct when it stated that the Canadian Government will profit most, that Canadian labor, materials, and engineers will enjoy a greater advantage on the work than the American workers and American engineers.

I still think the gentleman is as wrong as he possibly can be when he says the United States Government is going to be given credit in the full manner he indicated a few moments ago.

Mr. SNELL. I stated it as a fact.

Mr. MEAD. Then I may say to the gentleman from New York that for the first time in our congressional careers we are in violent opposition and we will have to have a conference in order to reconcile our viewpoints.

Mr. SNELL. One further question, if the gentleman will permit, and then I shall stop, or, if he prefers, I will take some time myself to straighten out my position on this canal matter. The gentleman says he wants an economic survey. How many economic surveys does the gentleman think are necessary?

Mr. MEAD. I would like to have one real survey.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman call those which already have been made by various commissions and engineers and every one reported favorably to the proposition?

Mr. MEAD. I would not call a survey that which was made by the Board of Army Engineers, the members of which were appointed by a President who is himself an avowed enthusiast for the project.

Mr. SNELL. What about the gentleman's own President?

Mr. MEAD. Certain transfers and changes were made in the personnel of the Board of Army Engineers. Then the Board was sent up there. A survey made by such a board could not be anything but biased. It should not be considered an official survey. That is not the kind of a survey I want. In my judgment America was sold out. That is what the Board of Army Engineers did. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know there have been at least five economic surveys of this project?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman that perhaps the best statement I read of this matter was made by a learned professor of a Wisconsin university while in attendance at a conference on this project. He pointed out better than I can the contention I am now making. Professor Mead pointed out very clearly the bad bargain agreed to by the American engineers.

The gentleman knows that when the President of the United States changes the personnel of the Board of Army Engineers, or has the power so to do, and then sends this Board to Canada with a request to come to an agreement with Canada, that their work does not constitute an economic survey.

Mr. SNELL. What about the views of the gentleman's own President on this proposition?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman, with regard to the position of the President, that while he is in favor of the treaty, he had nothing to do with the survey which was conducted under the Republican President, Mr. Hoover. He sent engineers up there with instructions to come to an agreement with the Canadian engineers.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman's President at least paid some attention to the matter.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Why should we need an economic survey? If the St. Lawrence canal were a feasible proposition, shipping interests would have gone there many years ago. The fact is the St. Lawrence River is fog bound 1 or 2 days a week, and ships using it must go through the iceberg region. This is why it is not used. We do not need an economic survey to tell us this.

Mr. MEAD. Yes. And for nearly 5 months of the year it is closed to navigation because of ice.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield me a little more time?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact also that at the Ottawa Imperial Conference Great Britain gave preferential rates to Canadian wheat and other products?

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct. At the Ottawa Conference they severely crippled American shipping interests on the Great Lakes. In my judgment, they did more at that conference than a country should do to a friendly neighbor in a hundred years; and that is an example of what they may do if we build this canal in their territory.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. What damage does the gentleman fear will be done the Atlantic ports by the construction of this seaway?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from Virginia that the Great Lakes furnish commerce to Atlantic ports, including Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston. This commerce will be diminished by the building of this waterway in the thought of developing markets for the products of the Northwestern States. If we do, we will suffer more than we will gain. We will be throwing open the Great Lakes to the tramp steamers and the cheapest labor of the world.

It will do irreparable damage to all the Atlantic ports, and I think it is going to menace the future well-being of American commerce.

Mr. DARDEN. Does not the gentleman also believe that a great deal of the coal now passing through the port of Norfolk will pass through the St. Lawrence Canal, if that canal is finally constructed?

Mr. MEAD. That applies not only to coal passing through the port of Norfolk, but also to the cheap coal of Soviet Russia which will come over here as ballast, in order that the ships going east might carry grain from Canada to the various European ports. It will do great damage to Norfolk and to all of the ports along the Atlantic seaboard, and, for that reason, I believe that an economic survey by disinterested experts should be made before we consider this treaty. Do you know that the Board of Army Engineers sent up there under President Hoover, according to the record as I read it, were in violent disagreement because the plan the Canadian engineers wanted them to adopt was the most expensive one? And yet the President of the United States admonished the engineers to come to an agreement; therefore they accepted the most expensive plan from our standpoint.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, if the improvement of the St. Lawrence River is going to be such a detriment to the United States of America, why is it that the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, is going to send the treaty down to the Senate and ask them to ratify the same?

Mr. MEAD. Let me say to the gentleman that I have not assumed the power or prerogative of speaking for the President of the United States, but if he is for the treaty I am just as much in opposition to him on that proposition as I was to President Hoover, who, perhaps more than the present President of the United States, is responsible for the treaty now being in the Senate. While I am not much of a prophet, I believe the Senate will reject the treaty and after that we may have a real economic survey.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman 1 more minute.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will admit one thing, and that is regardless of everything that has happened, the St. Lawrence River today carries more real commerce than any other river on this continent, or all the rest of them combined.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman at the beginning of his statement said that I would admit one thing. I will not admit that one thing.

Mr. SNELL. That is a fact anyway.

Mr. MEAD. I doubt it, because you are taking in too many rivers and covering much territory. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. But there is more real commerce there than there is on all the rest of our rivers combined. You have to admit that.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, on Monday, January 8, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a very important decision, and I think we should have the complete text and footnotes of the decision and the law of Minnesota extending the time in which mortgaged property can be redeemed in the RECORD for the information of the Members, including certain newspaper comments concerning that decision. I ask unanimous consent that this matter be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] asks unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and certain other matters referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. That opinion is not only an important opinion, but it is vital and historic. I want to call attention to the law and the opinion as rendered by Chief Justice Hughes and his associates, Justices Brandeis, Cardozo, Stone, and Roberts, who joined in the majority decision.

In the State of Minnesota we had an emergency, as you gentlemen have had emergencies in other States of the Union. We will not discuss why that emergency came on. We might differ on that. However, the emergency was there, and it was estimated on the floor of the legislature that some 50,000 mortgaged homes and farms were involved in foreclosure or possible foreclosure; that a population of 250,000 out of Minnesota's 2,600,000 people were affected.

Our Governor, Floyd B. Olson, of Minnesota, the first Farmer-Labor Governor in America, recommended laws along this line. Our attorney general, Harry H. Peterson, the first Farmer-Labor attorney general in America, intervened in defense of the law. Our attorney general and members of the Farmer-Labor Party drafted this bill, which became a law.

I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from New York ventured the prediction that the Farmer-Labor Party would disappear in the next election when it came into combat with one of the older parties. I venture to say that it will be a cold day in Minnesota before the old party there that he referred to will run the Farmer-Labor Party to cover. We have a Farmer-Labor Governor there; we have a majority of members in the house of representatives and many senators in the State senate of that State and Members of Congress. We expect to increase our strength. That may not be a popular statement to make on the floor at this time; however, I think it will be more popular later on.

This decison concerned a contest between human rights and property rights. The decisions and law seemed to be all against our position, except possibly in the rent cases. But the emergency was there. There has been a great deal of discussion as to other bills recently passed, being emergency legislation and coming under the wing of this decision by the Supreme Court. That matter I do not wish to discuss at this time. I do want the American public to know about this most-important Supreme Court decision, and you gentlemen have kindly given consent that this great opinion by our Chief Justice be read into the RECORD for the information of the Members of Congress and the American public. Many people have asked for the text of the opinion. I am informed it will be ready for distribution tonight. I make these few remarks now in order to call your attention to the matter, because it is of vital and historic importance.

WORLD WAR VETERANS' ADJUSTED COMPENSATION

I can hardly refrain at this time from calling the attention of Members to another matter. There is on the Clerk's desk a petition to discharge the committee from consideration of the Adjusted Service Compensation Act, commonly called the bonus bill.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman please tell me how many signatures are on that petition?

Mr. LUNDEEN. There were 54 signatures on the petition yesterday. I do not know how many have been added today.

Mr. DUNN. How many signatures are required in order to discharge the committee?

Mr. LUNDEEN. One hundred and forty-five. I thank the gentleman for his interruption, and we must see to it that the number of 145 is reached so that this great measure may come before the House.

Mr. DUNN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank you, and I want to say also that I would like to have the name of the author of the bill on the petition to get the bill out of the committee. The author of this bill H.R. 1, introduced the measure and the bill is sleeping away and resting in committee.

This bill will bring out $2,400,000,000 which will be paid in currency to the soldiers and their widows and orphans, and there are more than 83,000 of them in the State of Minnesota. It will give the State of Minnesota alone $54,000,000 and the city of Minneapolis $11,000,000, and yet I do not see the name of the author of the bill on the petition on the Speaker's desk to take the bill out of committee. I should like to have his distinguished name there, and I know that when he does put it there it will bring another 25 or 30 signatures of able and well-known Democrats, and we need the help of the Democrats with the overwhelming majority that they have in the House.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman know what Member of Congress is the author of the bill?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes, indeed; the very able and distinguished gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN. He has a very good bill there, and we want him to get up and fight on this floor for the bill that he is the father of and which he has introduced here. We want to see him walking down the aisle of Congress and tilting his lance against the enemies of the soldiers of America.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman says that 145 names are required. It is reported in the press that the leadership of the other side is proposing to increase that to 218. Suppose before 145 names are signed to the petition the number should be increased to 218, what would be the position of the present bill?

Mr. LUNDEEN. It would be in a very serious and perilous position, and I hope no such rule will be put over in this House. One hundred and forty-five is bad encugh. I should like to cut it down to 100.

REPEAL THE VICIOUS, BRUTAL, AND INHUMAN ECONOMY ACT

I also want to call attention to another bill my petition for which rests on the Speaker's desk, and that is a bill for the repeal of the vicious, brutal, and inhuman economy law which cut and slashed the pay of Federal employees and which cut and slashed pensions and compensation for our veterans, cutting and slashing Civil War men and their widows and orphans, a bill cruel and devastating to my Spanish-American comrades, their widows and orphans. We want to repeal this law and strike it from the statute books of the United States. I had the honor to introduce the first bill to repeal all of the so-called "economy law", a law destructive to veterans and Federal employees.

I should like to see my colleagues here on the left make their party the soldiers' party that it was for 50 years after the Civil War, when they missed only one Presidency in 50 years, because within the ranks of the Republican Party they had the soldiery of America, and if they have not learned their lesson now, they will learn it in 1934 and 1936, and they had better heed counsel at this time.

REFINANCE FARM AND HOME LOANS—THE FRAZIER BILL

There is another bill up there on the Speaker's desk that has some 65 signatures, and that is the Frazier refinancing of farm and home loans bill.

I should like to see 145 names on that petition to help the farmers of this great Nation of ours. The author of the bill sits on the floor of this House, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE], and Senator FRAZIER is over in the Senate, and they are both battling for this bill. We should have 145 names on this petition.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Certainly.

Mr. KVALE. Is it not true that at the present time 22 State legislatures have memorialized Congress to pass this measure?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I am informed by my friend and colleague here on this floor that 22 States have memorialized Congress in favor of the Frazier bill, and I believe after the Republican and Democratic Parties have been fighting themselves into each other's overcoat, as was stated here today, perhaps Members of Congress will give more consideration to the Farmer-Labor platform, program, and principles. I should like to see the Frazier bill enacted into law for the aid of the farmers.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman feel that the present farm-loan program is ample to take care of the situation?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I fear it is rather inadequate. I think it should be considerably improved, and the Frazier bill would be a great improvement.

SUPREME COURT DECISION

Now, referring again to this great decision that I spoke of in the beginning of my remarks, I call the Members' attention to the fact it will be in the RECORD tomorrow morning.

It may be of most vital importance to all the legislation enacted not only in the special session but in the session that is now upon us. I want the gentlemen of this House to give a little consideration to the Farmer-Labor Party. We have not very many Members here on the floor. There are only five Farmer-Labor Members here, but we would like to have you read over our platform and program and give it a little consideration. Perhaps you will not agree with very much of it, but you may see some good in it, and in these evil days that have befallen our beloved country we need all the help and all the ideas that can come from all parties, in order that we may solve the situation that is before us.

I feel entirely innocent of the great financial catastrophe that has come upon this country. I was here many years ago before any such catastrophe had occurred. I do not want to speak of that at this time. Now we have these various measures proposed—we have this Supreme Court decision. We should read them and study them and particularly give some attention to the petitions to discharge committees that are on the Speaker's desk. I should also like to see a little more leniency about learning the names of the Members who signed the petitions. The rules should enable us to know who they all are.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman state when that petition on the Frazier bill was placed at the desk?

Mr. LUNDEEN. That was placed there in the last session, the special session.

Mr. DUNN. I did not know about it.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. SEGER. The gentleman has alluded to the veterans and the dependents. Does he think it is fair to cut the widows of Spanish War veterans to $15 and give the widows of forest workers $40?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I do not think it is fair. I should like to have every Member of the House read the able speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] about his Spanish War comrades, when he said, "They are throwing them overboard, and I might as well go overboard with them." It was a wonderful speech, and I wish they would give more attention to it.

We have in America some 5,000,000 veterans, and I should like to see more consideration given to them. If I had the power, I would repeal every bit of the Economy Act put on the statute books last session and reinstate the veterans and Federal employees where they were before it was enacted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. While the gentleman is speaking about the platform of the Farmer-Labor he might state that we have been fighting for the bank-guarantee law that has just been put over here now in Congress for 17 years.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the gentleman, my colleague from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. And he might also say that for 15 years we have advocated reforestation in the West.

Mr. LUNDEEN. That is also true. And I want to call attention to the fact that before we adjourned the special session I opposed adjournment of the Congress until we could enact a real, a sound bank guaranty law and other necessary and vital legislation; and I was happy to see the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, come down the central aisle here swinging both fists in his battle for the bank guarantee deposit law. The bill was passed, and I hope it will do a great deal of good.

The Supreme Court of the United States handed down a notable decision on Minnesota's emergency mortgage moratorium law, Chief Justice Hughes writing the opinion, in which it was held that government possesses the power in emergencies to legislate for the public good. The decision referred to upheld the validity of the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law against the objections that it violated the due process with contract and equality clauses of the Constitution of the United States.

This decision is a victory for the farm and home owners in the State of Minnesota. The Minnesota mortgage moratorium law was enacted in answer to a State-wide demand by farm and home owners that they be protected against wholesale foreclosures of mortgages upon farms and homes during this economic depression, which is the most severe and catastrophic in the history of the human race.

By reason of the mortgage foreclosures and tax sales, thousands of farm and home owners of the State of Minnesota were losing their homes. At the beginning of the year 1933, when the Minnesota State Legislature was in session, it was estimated that at least 50,000 farms and homes would be lost to their owners during the year 1933 unless the government of the State of Minnesota afforded the people some relief.

The result was the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law, which embodies the ideas of Harry H. Peterson, the first Farmer-Labor attorney general in America. The bill was introduced into the Legislature of Minnesota by a group of Farmer-Labor legislators. It was modified and amended in many respects in the legislature, finally passed, and speedily signed by Gov. Floyd B. Olson, of Minnesota. The idea underlying this bill was to protect the farm owners and the home owners of the State of Minnesota so that they would not be ousted from their farms and homes and cast upon the highways and byways of that State and become a handicap and public charge. It was a conflict between the property rights and the mortgage holders and the human rights of the farm and the home owners and their dependents. If these mortgages had been foreclosed, the mortagees would have become the owners of these farms and homes, but it would not have satisfied their mortgages. If the farm and the home owners had been ousted from their farms and homes and each had an average of from four to five dependents, approximately 250,000 of the people of the State of Minnesota would have been rendered homeless and shelterless and in the most dire need, want, and suffering imaginable.

The decision just rendered sustains this law which enables the farm owners and the home owners upon application to the courts of Minnesota to obtain a moratorium on their mortgages to and through May 1, 1935. In the meantime it is hoped that cheap money will be made available through the Federal land banks and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and through further legislation, like the Frazier bill, so that the mortgages upon the farms and homes may be refinanced at low cost and at a low rate of interest, and the farms and homes of these people thus saved for them permanently. It is believed that the moratorium which these people obtain under this law will enable them to take advantage of the law mentioned and refinance their obligations and thus save their farms and homes. It will be seen that this law has conferred an incalculable benefit upon the people of the State of Minnesota.

The decision rendered by Chief Justice Hughes demonstrates that the powers of government are expansive and adaptable to the needs of the Nation, and that the Government has the power to take appropriate action in any emergency that may confront us. This decision is a landmark in the jurisprudence of the history of the United States and marks the triumph of public welfare in the human race over contract and property rights.

It is an outstanding achievement of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota which fought for this law and secured its enactment. It is a legal achievement for the Farmer-Labor attorney general of Minnesota, Harry H. Peterson, who suggested the present law and who defended it in the courts. He was the first attorney general in the United States to appear in an action involving the validity of a mortgage moratorium law, although many such actions have been brought in other States prior to the commencement of the action which was brought to test the validity of the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law.

It has often been said that government should serve the people. This is a case where government has and is actually serving the people by protecting the farms and the homes which are the foundation of the great State of Minnesota.

In this panic through which we are passing, commonly called a depression, a thousand and one remedies are offered by numerous officials and legislators. Among all these remedies none are more important than those which seek to save the farms and the homes of America. Nothing is more important than the fireside and homestead where the American family is reared. Destruction of the home may imperil the foundations of a nation itself. The loss of the home by foreclosure is destructive of morale; it is demoralizing.

When thousands of mortgagees are permitted to put their property rights and contract rights above human rights—the right to live, the right to have a roof over your head—an emergency exists which must be met by legislation, and which must be passed upon by the courts of this land.

On November 8, 1933, it was my pleasure to take my place beside the attorney general of the great State of Minnesota, Harry H. Peterson, when he and Mr. Ervin, of his staff, ably argued for the people of Minnesota in the Supreme Court of the United States—human rights as against the mortgage, contract, and property rights. It was well known that this argument was historic and that the decision would be historic, and that its effect would be great upon future legislation and the conduct of the Government. The attorney general and his associate made a strong argument and showed a complete grasp of the situation. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, showed a profound understanding of the situation in this great and overwhelming emergency.

This is a culmination of years of effort and fighting for debtor moratorium laws on the part of the great Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota, lead by our distinguished and able Governor, Floyd B. Olson, who has repeatedly recommended such laws, and who signed the bill which became a law and which was under scrutiny by the Supreme Court in this case.

Our Farmer-Labor legislators in our State legislatures, our Congressmen in the United States Congress, and our numerous speakers in many campaigns have fought out this issue with the enemy on the stump. This battle had to be won in many campaigns before the law appeared upon our statute books and before this law had an opportunity to be passed on by the Supreme Court of America.

When President Hoover issued a moratorium to Europe I frequently stated that the moratorium idea would come home to roost in America, against those who are holding overwhelming obligations against the mass of the people—an indebtedness so overwhelming that it is frequently referred to in round numbers as about $250,000,000,000 total—public and private indebtedness.

Our Minnesota Farmer-Labor leaders early determined that the farm and the home must be saved. I have frequently stated that if Uncle Sam can give moratoriums to the kings and emperors and nations of Europe we can give moratoriums to the American people. America first! If Uncle Sam can finance Europe to the extent of $10,000,000,000 and more—an amount with interest charges running close to twenty-five billions—if we can moratorium, refinance, and cancel in whole or in part this debt in favor of Europe, we can do as much for our own people here, under our own flag, and in our own land.

The Farmer-Labor Party acknowledges a great debt to the Farmers' Holiday Association, and the Farmers Union, and many other labor and cooperative organizations—pioneers in the great battle between property rights and human rights. The battle for social justice must go on until complete victory crowns the banners of a great National Farmer-Labor Party. [Applause.]

CHAPTER 339—H.F. NO. 1695

An act relating to the granting of relief in certain cases during the emergency declared to exist, from inequitable foreclosure of mortgages on real estate and execution sales of real estate and for postponing certain sales and for extending the periods of redemption from certain others; and relating to the jurisdiction and procedure for such relief and for the right to possession during the extended period, and for limiting the right to maintain actions for deficiency judgments, and for extending the expiration of certain periods of redemption to 30 days after the passage of this act

Whereas the severe financial and economic depression existing for several years past has resulted in extremely low prices for the products of the farms and the factories, a great amount of unemployment, an almost complete lack of credit for farmers, business men, and property owners, and a general and extreme stagnation of business, agriculture, and industry; and

Whereas many owners of real property, by reason of said conditions, are unable and, it is believed, will for some time be unable to meet all payments as they come due of taxes, interest, and principal of mortgages on their properties, and are, therefore, threatened with loss of such properties through mortgage foreclosure and judicial sales thereof; and

Whereas many such properties have been and are being bid in at mortgage foreclosure and execution sales for prices much below what is believed to be their real values, and often for much less than the mortgage or judgment indebtedness, thus entailing deficiency judgments against the mortgage and judgment debtors; and

Whereas it is believed, and the Legislature of Minnesota hereby declares its belief, that the conditions existing as hereinbefore set forth has created an emergency of such nature that justifies and validates legislation for the extension of the time of redemption from mortgage foreclosure and execution sales and other relief of a like character; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota possesses the right, under its police power, to declare a state of emergency to exist; and

Whereas the inherent and fundamental purpose of our Government is to safeguard the public and promote the general welfare of the people; and

Whereas under existing conditions the foreclosure of many real-estate mortgages by advertisement would prevent fair, open, and competitive bidding at the time of sale in the manner now contemplated by law; and

Whereas it is believed, and the Legislature of Minnesota hereby declares its belief, that the conditions existing as hereinbefore set forth have created an emergency of such a nature that justifies and validates changes in legislation providing for the temporary manner, method, terms, and conditions upon which mortgage foreclosure sales may be had or postponed and jurisdiction to administer equitable relief in connection therewith may be conferred upon the district court; and

Whereas Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, section 9608, which provides for the postponement of mortgage foreclosure sales, has remained for more than 30 years, a provision of the statutes in contemplation of which provisions for foreclosure by advertisement have been agreed upon: Now, therefore

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, The provisions of this act shall not apply to any mortgage while such mortgage is held by the United States or by any agency, department, bureau, board, or commission thereof, as security or pledge of the maker, its successors or assigns, nor shall the provisions of this act apply to any mortgage held as security or pledge to secure payment of a public debt or to secure payment of the deposit of public funds.

The following sections of this act preceding part 2 shall constitute part 1.

SECTION 1. Emergency declared to exist: In view of the situation hereinbefore set forth, the Legislature of the State of Minnesota hereby declares that a public economic emergency does exist in the State of Minnesota.

SEC. 2. Mortgagee may apply to district court for relief: In any proceedings heretofore commenced for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate by advertisement, in which a sale of the property has not been had, or in any such proceedings hereafter commenced, when the mortgagor, or the owner in possession of the mortgaged premises, or anyone claiming under said mortgagor, or anyone liable for the mortgage debt, at any time after the issuance of the notice of such foreclosure proceedings, shall apply to the district court of the county wherein such foreclosure proceedings are being had, or are pending, by filing and serving a summons and verified complaint with prayer that the sale in foreclosure by advertisement shall be postponed and that the foreclosure, if any, shall proceed by action. If it appears to the court that granting of the relief as prayed would be equitable and just, then, and in that event, the foreclosure proceedings by advertisement may be postponed by the court by an ex parte order which shall be served with the summons and complaint upon the party foreclosing, or his attorney, and at the time of the hearing upon such order the court may then further postpone such sale, and the parties seeking to foreclose such mortgage shall proceed, if at all, to foreclose said mortgage by interposing a cross complaint in such action. Such service may be made as now provided for the service of a summons in a civil action, or by registered mail on the person foreclosing or his authorized agent or attorney at the last-known address of such person, agent, or attorney, respectively. As a condition precedent to such postponement of such foreclosure sale by advertisement the party filing such verified complaint shall pay to the clerk for the person foreclosing the mortgage the expenses incurred, not including attorney's fees, which may accrue prior to any postponement. The filing of such verified complaint shall be deemed a waiver of publication of notice of postponement of the foreclosure sale and the sale at the time which may be fixed by the court shall be deemed to be a sale postponed in lieu of the time of sale specified in the published notice of mortgage foreclosure sale.

SEC. 3. Court may order resale: When any mortgage has been foreclosed by action, the court shall, on the coming in of the report of sale, cause notice of a hearing thereon to be served on the parties to the action who have appeared, and fix the time and place for the hearing on said report. Before granting an order confirming said sale, the court shall, if it appears upon due examination that the sale price is unreasonably and unfairly inadequate, or that justice has otherwise not been done, order a resale. If the sale is confirmed, the sheriff, or his deputy, shall forthwith execute and deliver the proper certificate of sale which shall be recorded within 20 days after such confirmation. Upon the hearing of the motion for an order confirming the sale of the premises involved in the foreclosure of mortgages by action, in case the evidence is insufficient to establish a fair and reasonable market or rental value of such property, the court shall receive any competent evidence, including evidence tending to establish the actual value of the property involved in said mortgage foreclosure proceedings, for the purpose, or purposes, for which said property is or can be used. The court shall also receive any evidence tending to show to what extent, if any, the property has decreased in actual or market value by reason of the economic conditions existing at the time of or prior to such sale.

SEC. 3. 1. Compromises: In case the parties to any such foreclosure action shall agree in writing upon terms of compromise settlement thereof, or of composition of the mortgage indebtedness, or both, the court shall have jurisdiction and may by its order confirm and approve such settlement or composition, or both, as the case may be.

SEC. 3. 2. Jurisdiction of court: The court shall have the same jurisdiction to postpone the enforcement of judgment by execution sale or to order resale or give other relief where such judgment is rendered in an action to collect a debt or obligation secured by a real-estate mortgage, the foreclosure of which might be affected under the terms of this act, as is conferred by this act with regard to the mortgage.

SEC. 4. Period of redemption may be extended: Where any mortgage upon real property has been foreclosed and the period of redemption has not yet expired, or where a sale is hereafter had, in the case of real-estate mortgage foreclosure proceedings, now pending, or which may hereafter be instituted prior to the expiration of 2 years from and after the passage of this act, or upon the sale of any real property under any judgment or execution where the period of redemption has not yet expired, or where such sale is made hereafter within 2 years from and after the passage of this act, the period of redemption may be extended for such additional time as the court may deem just and equitable, but in no event beyond May 1, 1935: Provided, That the mortgagor, or the owner in possession of said property, in the case of mortgage foreclosure proceedings, or the judgment debtor, in case of sale under judgment or execution shall, prior to the expiration of the period of redemption, apply to the district court having jurisdiction of the matter, on not less than 10 days' written notice to the mortgagee or judgment creditor, or the attorney of either, as the case may be, for an order determining the reasonable value of the income on said property, or, if the property has no income, then the reasonable rental value of the property involved in such sale, and directing and requiring such mortgagor or judgment debtor to pay all or a reasonable part of such income or rental value, in or toward the payment of taxes, insurance, interest, mortgage, or judgment indebtness at such times and in such manner as shall be fixed and determined and ordered by the court; and the court shall thereupon hear said application and after such hearing shall make and file its order directing the payment by such mortgagor, or judgment debtor, of such an amount at such times and in such manner as to the court shall, under all the circumstances, appear just and equitable: Provided, That upon the service of the notice or demand aforesaid that the running of the period of redemption shall be tolled until the court shall make its order upon such application: Provided further, however, That if such mortgagor or judgment debtor, or personal representative, shall default in the payments, or any of them, in such order required, on his part to be done, or commits waste, his right to redeem from said sale shall terminate 30 days after such default, and holders of subsequent liens may redeem in the order and manner now provided by law, beginning 30 days after the filing of notice of such default with the clerk of such district court, and his right to possession shall cease and the party acquiring title to any such real estate shall then be entitled to the immediate possession of said premises. If default is claimed by allowance of waste, such 30-day period shall not begin to run until the filing of an order of the court finding such waste: Provided further, That the time of redemption from any real-estate mortgage foreclosure or judgment or execution sale heretofore made, which otherwise would expire less than 30 days after the passage and approval of this act, shall be, and the same hereby is, extended to a date 30 days after the passage and approval of this act, and in such case the mortgagor, or judgment debtor, or the assigns or personal representative of either, as the case may be, or the owner in the possession of the property, may, prior to said date, apply to said court for and the court may thereupon grant the relief as hereinbefore and in this section provided: Provided further, That prior to May 1, 1935, no action shall be maintained in this State for a deficiency judgment until the period of redemption as allowed by existing law, or as extended under the provisions of this act, has expired.

SEC. 5. Court may revise and alter terms: Upon the application of either party prior to the expiration of the extended period of redemption as provided in this act and upon the presentation of evidence that the terms fixed by the court are no longer just and reasonable, the court may revise and alter said terms, in such manner as the changed circumstances and conditions may require.

SEC. 6. Trial to be held within 30 days: The trial of any action, hearing, or proceeding mentioned in this act shall be held within 30 days after the filing by either party of notice of hearing or trial, as the case may be, and such hearing or trial may be held at any general or special term, or in chambers, or during vacation of the court, and the order of the court shall be filed within 5 days after trial or hearing, no more than 5 days' stay shall be granted, and review by the supreme court may be had by certiorari if application for the writ shall be made within 15 days after notice of such order, and such writ shall be returnable within 30 days after the filing of such order.

SEC. 7. Inconsistent laws suspended until May 1, 1935: Every law and all the provisions thereof now in force insofar as inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby suspended until May 1, 1935. No extension of the period for redemption nor any postponement of sale shall be ordered or allowed under this act which would have the effect of extending the period for redemption beyond May 1, 1935.

SEC. 8. Application of act: This act as to mortgage foreclosures shall apply only to mortgages made prior to the passage and approval of this act but shall not apply to mortgages made prior to the passage of this act which shall hereafter be renewed or extended for a period ending more than 1 year after the passage of this act; neither shall this act apply in any way which would allow a resale, stay, postponement, or extension to such time that any right might be adversely affected by a statute of limitation.

SEC. 9. Provisions severable: The provisions of this act are hereby declared to be severable. If one provision hereof shall be found by the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such decision shall not affect the validity of the other provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. Definition: The words "mortgagor", "mortgagee", "judgment creditor", "judgment debtor", and "purchaser", whenever used in this act shall be construed to include the plural as well as the singular and also to include their personal representatives, successors, and assigns.

SEC. 11. Application: Whenever the term "this act" is referred to in that part of the bill amended so as to constitute part 1 thereof, the same shall be construed as having reference only to part 1 of this act.

PART 2

SECTION 1. To apply to homesteads only: The following, part 2, of this act shall apply only to real estate occupied as a home exclusively by the person seeking relief or persons dependent upon him and to farm lands used by the person seeking relief as his principal means of furnishing necessary support to such person, his family and dependents, and shall apply only to cases not entitled to relief under some valid provision of part 1 of this act.

SEC. 2. Mortgagee may apply to district court for relief: In any proceedings heretofore commenced for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate by advertisement, in which a sale of the property has not been had, or in any such proceedings hereafter commenced, when the mortgagor, or the owner in possession of the mortgaged premises, or anyone claiming under said mortgagor, or anyone liable for the mortgage debt, at any time after the issuance of the notice of such foreclosure proceedings, shall apply to the district court of the county wherein such foreclosure proceedings are being had, or are pending, by filing and serving a summons and verified complaint with prayer that the sale in foreclosure by advertisement shall be postponed and that the foreclosure, if any, shall proceed by action. If it appears to the court that granting of the relief as prayed would be equitable and just, then, and in that event, the foreclosure proceedings by advertisement may be postponed by the court by an ex parte order which shall be served with the summons and complaint upon the party foreclosing or his attorney and at the time of the hearing upon such order, the court may then further postpone such sale, and the parties seeking to foreclose such mortgage shall proceed, if at all, to foreclose said mortgage by interposing a cross-complaint in such action. Such service may be made as now provided for the service of a summons in a civil action, or by registered mail on the person foreclosing or his authorized agent or attorney at the last known address of such person, agent, or attorney, respectively. As a condition precedent to such postponement of such foreclosure sale by advertisement the party filing such verified complaint shall pay to the clerk for the person foreclosing the mortgage the expenses incurred, not including attorney's fees, which may accrue prior to any postponement. The filing of such verified complaint shall be deemed a waiver of publication of notice of postponement of the foreclosure sale and the sale at the time which may be fixed by the court shall be deemed to be a sale postponed in lieu of the time of sale specified in the published notice of mortgage foreclosure sale.

SEC. 3. Jurisdiction of court: The court shall have the same jurisdiction to postpone the enforcement of judgment by execution sale or to order resale or give other relief where such judgment is rendered in an action to collect a debt or obligation secured by a real-estate mortgage, the foreclosure of which might be affected under the terms of this act, as is conferred by this act with regard to the mortgage.

SEC. 4. Application of act: The provisions hereof shall not apply to mortgages made after the passage of this act, nor to mortgages made prior to the passage of this act which shall hereafter be renewed or extended to become due more than a year after such passage; neither shall this act apply in any way which would allow a resale, stay, postponement, or extension to such time that any right might be adversely affected by a statute of limitation.

SEC. 5. Limitations of act: No postponement or extension shall be ordered under conditions which, under the temporary emergency, would substantially diminish or impair the value of the contract or obligation of the person against whom the relief is sought, without reasonable allowance to justify the exercise of the police power hereby authorized.

SEC. 6. Trial to be held within 20 days: The trial of any action, hearing, or proceeding provided for in this act shall be held within 20 days after the filing by either party of notice of hearing or trial, as the case may be, and such hearing or trial may be held at any general or special term, or in chambers, or during vacation of the court, and the order of the court shall be filed within 5 days after trial or hearing, no more than 5 days' stay shall be granted within which to apply for amended findings, and order or for review, and review by the Supreme Court may be had by certiorari, if application for the writ shall be made within 10 days after notice of such order and such writ shall be returnable within 30 days after the filing of such order.

SEC. 7. Provisions separable: The provisions of this act shall be separable. The invalidity of any one provision, section, or part shall not affect the validity of the remainder. Wherever the term "this act" or "hereof" are used in part 2, the same shall be construed as having no reference to part 1.

SEC. 8. Duration of act limited: This act shall remain in effect only during the continuance of the emergency and in no event beyond May 1, 1935. No extension of the period for redemption nor any postponement of sale shall be ordered or allowed under this act which would have the effect of extending the period for redemption beyond May 1, 1935.

SEC. 9. Application of act: Nothing in part 2 of this act shall limit or restrict any provision of part 1.

Approved April 18, 1933.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 370.—October term, 1933

HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION, APPELLANT, v. JOHN H. BLAISDELL AND ROSELLA BLAISDELL, HIS WIFE. APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

[Jan. 8, 1934]

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court.

Appellant contests the validity of chapter 339 of the Laws of Minnesota of 1933, page 514, approved April 18, 1933, called the "Minnesota Mortgage Moratorium Law", as being repugnant to the contract clause (art. I, sec. 10) and the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. The statute was sustained by the Supreme Court of Minnesota (249 N.W. 334, 893) and the case comes here on appeal.

The act provides that, during the emergency declared to exist, relief may be had through authorized judicial proceedings with respect to foreclosures of mortgages, and execution sales of real estate; that sales may be postponed and periods of redemption may be extended. The act does not apply to mortgages subsequently made nor to those made previously which shall be extended for a period ending more than a year after the passage of the act (pt. 1, sec. 8). There are separate provisions in part 2 relating to homesteads, but these are to apply "only to cases not entitled to relief under some valid provision of part 1." The act is to remain in effect "only during the continuance of the emergency and in no event beyond May 1, 1935." No extension of the period for redemption and no postponement of sale is to be allowed which would have the effect of extending the period of redemption beyond that date (pt. 2, sec. 8.)

The act declares that the various provisions for relief are severable; that each is to stand on its own footing with respect to validity (pt. 1, sec. 9.) We are here concerned with the provisions of part 1, section 4, authorizing the district court of the county to extend the period of redemption from foreclosure sales "for such additional time as the court may deem just and equitable", subject to the above-described limitation. The extension is to be made upon application to the court, on notice, for an order determining the reasonable value of the income on the property involved in the sale, or if it has no income, then the reasonable rental value of the property, and directing the mortgagor "to pay all or a reasonable part of such income or rental value, in or toward the payment of taxes, insurance, interest, mortgage * * * indebtedness at such times and in such manner" as shall be determined by the court.[1] The section also provides that the time for redemption from foreclosure sales theretofore made, which otherwise would expire less than 30 days after the approval of the act shall be extended to a date 30 days after its approval, and application may be made to the court within that time for a further extension as provided in the section. By another provision of the act, no action, prior to May 1, 1935, may be maintained for a deficiency judgment until the period of redemption as allowed by existing law or as extended under the provisions of the act has expired. Prior to the expiration of the extended period of redemption the court may revise or alter the terms of the extension as changed circumstances may require (pt. 1, sec. 5).

Invoking the relevant provision of the statute, appellees applied to the district court of Hennepin County for an order extending the period of redemption from a foreclosure sale. Their petition stated that they owned a lot in Minneapolis which they had mortgaged to appellant; that the mortgage contained a valid power of sale by advertisement and that by reason of their default the mortgage had been foreclosed and sold to appellant on May 2, 1932, for $3,700.98; that appellant was the holder of the sheriff's certificate of sale; that because of the economic depression appellees had been unable to obtain a new loan or to redeem, and that unless the period of redemption were extended the property would be irretrievably lost; and that the reasonable value of the property greatly exceeded the amount due on the mortgage including all liens, costs and expenses.

On the hearing, appellant objected to the introduction of evidence upon the ground that the statute was invalid under the Federal and State Constitutions, and moved that the petition be dismissed. The motion was granted, and a motion for a new trial was denied. On appeal, the supreme court of the State reversed the decision of the district court (249 N.W. 334). Evidence was then taken in the trial court, and appellant renewed its constitutional objections without avail. The court made findings of fact setting forth the mortgage made by the appellees on August 1, 1928, the power of sale contained in the mortgage, the default and foreclosure by advertisement, and the sale to appellant on May 2, 1932, for $3,700.98. The court found that the time to redeem would expire on May 2, 1933, under the laws of the State as they were in effect when the mortgage was made and when it was foreclosed; that the reasonable value of the income on the property, and the reasonable rental value, was $40 a month; that the bid made by appellant on the foreclosure sale, and the purchase price, were the full amount of the mortgage indebtedness, and that there was no deficiency after the sale; that the reasonable present market value of the premises was $6,000; and that the total amount of the purchase price, with taxes and insurance premiums subsequently paid by appellant, but exclusive of interest from the date of sale, was $4,056.39. The court also found that the property was situated in the closely built-up portions of Minneapolis; that it had been improved by a 2-car garage, together with a building two stories in height which was divided into 14 rooms; that the appellees, husband and wife, occupied the premises as their homestead, occupying 3 rooms and offering the remaining rooms for rental to others.

The court entered its judgment extending the period of redemption to May 1, 1935, subject to the condition that the appellees should pay to the appellant $40 a month through the extended period from May 2, 1933, that is, that in each of the months of August, September, and October, 1933, the payments should be $80, in two installments, and thereafter $40 a month, all these amounts to go to the payment of taxes, insurance, interest, and mortgage indebtedness.[2] It is this judgment, sustained by the supreme court of the State on the authority of its former opinion, which is here under review (249 N.W. 893).

The State court upheld the statute as an emergency measure. Although conceding that the obligations of the mortgage contract were impaired, the court decided that what it thus described as an impairment was, notwithstanding the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, within the police power of the State as that power was called into exercise by the public economic emergency which the legislature had found to exist. Attention is thus directed to the preamble and first section of the statute which described the existing emergency in terms that were deemed to justify the temporary relief which the statute affords.[3] The State

[1] That section is as follows:

"SEC. 4. Period of redemption may be extended.—Where any mortgage upon real property has been foreclosed and the period of redemption has not yet expired, or where a sale is hereafter had, in the case of real-estate mortgage foreclosure proceedings, now pending, or which may hereafter be instituted prior to the expiration of 2 years from and after the passage of this act, or upon the sale of any real property under any judgment or execution where the period of redemption has not yet expired, or where such sale is made hereafter within 2 years from and after the passage of this act, the period of redemption may be extended for such additional time as the court may deem just and equitable, but in no event beyond May 1, 1935; provided that the mortgagor, or the owner in possession of said property, in the case of mortgage foreclosure proceedings, or the judgment debtor, in case of sale under judgment or execution, shall prior to the expiration of the period of redemption, apply to the district court having jurisdiction of the matter, on not less than 10 days' written notice to the mortgagee or judgment creditor, or the attorney of either, as the case may be, for an order determining the reasonable value of the income on said property, or, if the property has no income, then the reasonable rental value of the property involved in such sale, and directing and requiring such mortgagor or judgment debtor to pay all or a reasonable part of such income or rental value, in or toward the payment of taxes, insurance, interest, mortgage or judgment indebtedness at such times and in such manner as shall be fixed and determined and ordered by the court; and the court shall thereupon hear said application and after such hearing shall make and file its order directing the payment by such mortgagor, or judgment debtor, of such an amount at such times and in such manner as to the court shall, under all the circumstances, appear just and equitable. Provided that upon the service of the notice or demand aforesaid that the running of the period of redemption shall be tolled until the court shall make its order upon such application. Provided further, however, that if such mortgagor or judgment debtor or personal representative, shall default in the payments, or any of them, in such order required, on his part to be done, or commits waste, his right to redeem from said sale shall terminate 30 days after such default and holders of subsequent liens may redeem in the order and manner now provided by law beginning 30 days after the filing of notice of such default with the clerk of such district court, and his right to possession shall cease and the party acquiring title to any such real estate shall then be entitled to the immediate possession of said premises. If default is claimed by allowance of waste, such 30-day period shall not begin to run until the filing of an order of the court finding such waste. Provided, further, that the time of redemption from any real-estate mortgage foreclosure or judgment or execution sale heretofore made, which otherwise would expire less than 30 days after the passage and approval of this act, shall be and the same hereby is extended to a date 30 days after the passage and approval of this act, and in such case the mortgagor, or judgment debtor, or the assigns or personal representative of either, as the case may be, or the owner in the possession of the property, may, prior to said date, apply to said court for and the court may thereupon grant the relief as hereinbefore and in this section provided. Provided, further, that prior to May 1, 1935, no action shall be maintained in this State for a deficiency judgment until the period of redemption as allowed by existing law or as extended under the provisions of this act has expired."

[2] A joint statement of the counsel for both parties, filed with the court on the argument in this court, shows that, after providing for taxes, insurance, and interest, and crediting the payments to be made by the mortgagor under the judgment, the amount necessary to redeem May 1, 1935, would be $4,258.82.

[3] The preamble and the first section of the act are as follows:

"Whereas, the severe financial and economic depression existing for several years past has resulted in extremely low prices for the products of the farms and the factories, a great amount of unemployment, an almost complete lack of credit for farmers, business men and property owners and a general and extreme stagnation of business, agriculture and industry, and

"Whereas, many owners of real property, by reason of said conditions, are unable, and it is believed, will for some time be unable to meet all payments as they come due of taxes, interest and principal of mortgages on their properties and are, therefore, threatened with loss of such properties through mortgage foreclosure and judicial sales thereof, and

"Whereas, many such properties have been and are being bid in at mortgage foreclosure and execution sales for prices much below what is believed to be their real values and often for much less than the mortgage or judgment indebtedness, thus entailing deficiency judgment against the mortgage and judgment debtors, and

"Whereas, it is believed, and the Legislature of Minnesota hereby declares its belief, that the conditions existing as hereinbefore set forth have created an emergency of such nature that justifies and validates legislation for the extension of the time of redemption from mortgage foreclosure and execution sales and other relief of a like character; and

"Whereas, the State of Minnesota possesses the right under its police power to declare a state of emergency to exist, and

"Whereas, the inherent and fundamental purpose of our Government is to safeguard the public and promote the general welfare of the people; and

"Whereas, under existing conditions the foreclosure of many real estate mortgages by advertisement would prevent fair, open, and competitive bidding at the time of sale in the manner now contemplated by law, and

"Whereas, it is believed, and the Legislature of Minnesota hereby declares its belief, that the conditions existing as hereinbefore set forth have created an emergency of such a nature that justifies and validates changes in legislation providing for the temporary manner, method, terms and conditions upon which mortgage foreclosure sales may be had or postponed and jurisdiction to administer equitable relief in connection therewith may be conferred upon the district court, and

"Whereas, Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, sec. 9608, which provides for the postponement of mortgage foreclosure sales, has remained for more than 30 years, a provision of the statutes in contemplation of which provisions for foreclosure by advertisement have been agreed upon;"

"SECTION 1. Emergency declared to exist.—In view of the situation hereinbefore set forth, the Legislature of the State of Minnesota hereby declares that a public economic emergency does exist in the State of Minnesota."

court, declaring that it could not say that this legislative finding was without basis, supplemented that finding by its own statement of conditions of which it took judicial notice. The court said:

"In addition to the weight to be given the determination of the legislature that an economic emergency exists which demands relief, the court must take notice of other considerations. The members of the legislature come from every community of the State and from all the walks of life. They are familiar with conditions generally in every calling, occupation, profession, and business in the State. Not only they, but the courts must be guided by what is common knowledge. It is common knowledge that in the last few years land values have shrunk enormously. Loans made a few years ago upon the basis of the then going values cannot possibly be replaced on the basis of present values. We all know that when this law was enacted the large financial companies, which had made it their business to invest in mortgages, had ceased to do so. No bank would directly or indirectly loan on real estate mortgages. Life insurance companies, large investors in such mortgages, had even declared a moratorium as to the loan provisions of their policy contracts. The President had closed banks temporarily. The Congress, in addition to many extraordinary measures looking to the relief of the economic emergency, had passed an act to supply funds whereby mortgagors may be able within a reasonable time to refinance their mortgages or redeem from sales where the redemption has not expired. With this knowledge the court cannot well hold that the legislature had no basis in fact for the conclusion that an economic emergency existed which called for the exercise of the police power to grant relief."

Justice Olsen of the State court, in a concurring opinion, added the following:

"The present Nation-wide and world-wide business and financial crisis has the same results as if it were caused by flood, earthquake, or disturbance in nature. It has deprived millions of persons in this Nation of their employment and means of earning a living for themselves and their families; it has destroyed the value of and the income from all property on which thousands of people depended for a living; it actually has resulted in the loss of their homes by a number of our people and threatens to result in the loss of their homes by many other people in this State; it has resulted in such wide-spread want and suffering among our people that private, State and municipal agencies are unable to adequately relieve the want and suffering and Congress has found it necessary to step in and attempt to remedy the situation by Federal aid. Millions of the people's money were and are yet tied up in closed banks and in business enterprises."[4]

We approach the questions thus presented upon the assumption made below, as required by the law of the State, that the mortgage contained a valid power of sale to be exercised in case of default; that this power was validly exercised; that under the law then applicable the period of redemption from the sale was 1 year and that it has been extended by the judgment of the court over the opposition of the mortgagee-purchaser; and that during the period thus extended, and unless the order for extension is modified, the mortgagee-purchaser will be unable to obtain possession, or to obtain or convey title in fee, as he would have been able to do had the statute not been enacted. The statute does not impair the integrity of the mortgage indebtedness. The obligation for interest remains. The statute does not affect the validity of the sale or the right of a mortgagee-purchaser to title in fee, or his right to obtain a deficiency judgment, if the mortgagor fails to redeem within the prescribed period. Aside from the extension of time, the other conditions of redemption are unaltered. While the mortgagor remains in possession he must pay the rental value as that value has been determined, upon notice and hearing, by the court. The rental value so paid is devoted to the carrying of the property by the application of the required payments to taxes, insurance, and interest on the mortgage indebtedness. While the mortgagee-purchaser is debarred from actual possession, he has, so far as rental value is concerned, the equivalent of possession during the extended period.

In determining whether the provision for this temporary and conditional relief exceeds the power of the State by reason of the clause in the Federal Constitution prohibiting impairment of the obligations of contracts, we must consider the relation of emergency to constitutional power, the historical setting of the contract clause, the development of the jurisprudence of this court in the construction of that clause, and the principles of construction which we may consider to be established.

Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved. The Constitution was adopted in a period of grave emergency. Its grants of power to the Federal Government and its limitations of the power of the States were determined in the light of emergency and they are not altered by emergency. What power was thus granted and what limitations were thus imposed are questions which have always been, and always will be, the subject of close examination under our constitutional system.

While emergency does not create power, emergency may furnish the occasion for the exercise of power. "Although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of a living power already enjoyed" (Wilson v. New, 243 U.S. 332, 348). The constitutional question presented in the light of an emergency is whether the power possessed embraces the particular exercise of it in response to particular conditions. Thus, the war power of the Federal Government is not created by the emergency of war, but it is a power given to meet that emergency. It is a power to wage war successfully and thus it permits the harnessing of the entire energies of the people in a supreme cooperative effort to preserve the Nation. But even the war power does not remove constitutional limitations safeguarding essential liberties.[5] When the provisions of the Constitution, in grant or restriction, are specific, so particularized as not to admit of construction, no question is presented. Thus, emergency would not permit a State to have more than two Senators in the Congress, or permit the election of President by a general popular vote without regard to the number of electors to which the States are respectively entitled or permit the States to "coin money" or to "make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." But where constitutional grants and limitations of power are set forth in general clauses, which afford a broad outline, the process of construction is essential to fill in the details. That is true of the contract clause. The necessity of construction is not obviated by the fact that the contract clause is associated in the same section with other and more specific prohibitions. Even the grouping of subjects in the same clause may not require the same application to each of the subjects, regardless of differences in their nature. (See Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. 449, 505; Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers v. United States, 286 U.S. 427, 434.)

In the construction of the contract clause, the debates in the Constitutional Convention are of little aid.[6] But the reasons which led to the adoption of that clause, and of the other prohibitions of section 10 of article I, are not left in doubt and have frequently been described with eloquent emphasis.[7] The wide-spread distress following the revolutionary period and the plight of debtors had called forth in the States an ignoble array of legislative schemes for the defeat of creditors and the invasion of contractual obligations. Legislative interferences had been so numerous and extreme that the confidence essential to prosperous trade had been undermined and the utter destruction of credit was threatened. "The sober people of America" were convinced that some "thorough reform" was needed which would "inspire a general prudence and industry, and give a regular course to the business of society" (The Federalist, no. 44). It was necessary to interpose the restraining power of a central authority in order to secure the foundations even of "private faith." The occasion and general purpose of the contract clause are summed up in the terse statment of Chief Justice Marshall in Ogden v. Saunders (12 Wheat., pp. 213, 354, 355): "The power of changing the rela-

[4] The attorney general of the State in his argument before this court made the following statement of general conditions in Minnesota: "Minnesota is predominantly an agricultural State. A little more than one half of its people live on farms. At the time this law was passed the prices of farm products had fallen to a point where most of the persons engaged in farming could not realize enough from their products to support their families and pay taxes and interest on the mortgages on their homes. In the fall and winter of 1932 in the villages and small cities where most of the farmers must market their produce, corn was quoted as low as 8 cents per bushel, oats 2 cents and wheat 29 cents per bushel, eggs at 7 cents per dozen and butter at 10 cents per pound. The industry second in importance is mining. In normal times Minnesota produces about 60 percent of the iron of the United States and nearly 30 percent of all the iron produced in the world. In 1932 the production of iron fell to less than 15 percent of normal production. The families of idle miners soon became destitute and had to be supported by public funds. Other industries of the State, such as lumbering and the manufacture of wood products, the manufacture of farm machinery and various goods of steel and iron have also been affected disastrously by the depression. Because of the increased burden on the State and its political subdivisions which resulted from the depression, taxes on lands, which provide by far the major portion of the taxes in this State, were increased to such an extent that in many instances they became confiscatory. Tax delinquencies were alarmingly great, rising as high as 78 percent in one county of the State. In seven counties of the State the tax delinquency was over 50 percent. Because of these delinquencies many towns, school districts, villages and cities were practically bankrupt. In many of these political subdivisions of the State local government would have ceased to function and would have collapsed had it not been for loans from the State." The attorney general also stated that serious breaches of the peace had occurred.

tive situation of debtor and creditor, of interfering with contracts, a power which comes home to every man, touches the interest of all, and controls the conduct of every individual in those things which he supposes to be proper for his own exclusive management, had been used to such an excess by the State legislatures, as to break in upon the ordinary intercourse of society, and destroy all confidence between man and man. The mischief had become so great, so alarming, as not only to impair commercial intercourse, and threaten the existence of credit, but to sap the morals of the people, and destroy the sanctity of private faith. To guard against the continuance of the evil was an object of deep interest with all the truly wise, as well as the virtuous, of this great community, and was one of the important benefits expected from a reform of the Government."

But full recognition of the occasion and general purpose of the clause does not suffice to fix its precise scope. Nor does an examination of the details of prior legislation in the States yield criteria which can be considered controlling. To ascertain the scope of the constitutional prohibition we examine the course of judicial decisions in its application. These put it beyond question that the prohibition is not an absolute one and is not to be read with literal exactness like a mathematical formula. Justice Johnson, in Ogden v. Saunders, supra (p. 286), adverted to such a misdirected effort in these words: "It appears to me, that a great part of the difficulties of the cause, arise from not giving sufficient weight to the general intent of this clause in the Constitution, and subjecting it to a severe literal construction, which would be better adapted to special pleadings." And after giving his view as to the purport of the clause—"that the States shall pass no law, attaching to the acts of individuals other effects or consequences than those attached to them by the laws existing at their date; and all contracts thus construed, shall be enforced according to their just and reasonable purport"—Justice Johnson added: "But to assign to contracts, universally, a literal purport, and to exact for them a rigid literal fulfillment, could not have been the intent of the Constitution. It is repelled by a hundred examples. Societies exercise a positive control as well over the inception, construction, and fulfillment of contracts, as over the form and measure of the remedy to enforce them."

The inescapable problems of construction have been: What is a contract?[8] What are the obligations of contracts? What constitutes impairment of these obligations? What residuum of power is there still in the States, in relation to the operation of contracts, to protect the vital interests of the community? Questions of this character, "of no small nicety and intricacy, have vexed the legislative halls, as well as the judicial tribunals, with an uncounted variety and frequency of litigation and speculation" (Story on the Constitution, sec. 1375).

The obligation of a contract is "the law which binds the parties to perform their agreement." (Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 197; Story, op. cit., sec. 1378.) This court has said that "the laws which subsist at the time and place of the making of a contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. This principle embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge and enforcement. * * * Nothing can be more material to the obligation than the means of enforcement. * * * The ideas of validity and remedy are inseparable, and both are parts of the obligation, which is guaranteed by the Constitution against invasion." (Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535, 550, 552. See, also, Walker v. Whitehead, 16 Wall. 314, 317.) But this broad language cannot be taken without qualification. Chief Justice Marshall pointed out the distinction between obligation and remedy (Sturges v. Crowninshield, supra, p. 200). Said he: "The distinction between the obligation of a contract, and the remedy given by the legislature to enforce that obligation, has been taken at the bar, and exists in the nature of things. Without impairing the obligation of the contract, the remedy may certainly be modified as the wisdom of the Nation shall direct." And in Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, supra (pp. 553, 554), the general statement above quoted was limited by the further observation that "It is competent for the States to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise, as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. No attempt has been made to fix definitely the line between alterations of the remedy, which are to be deemed legitimate, and those which, under the form of modifying the remedy, impair substantial rights. Every case must be determined upon its own circumstances." And Chief Justice Waite, quoting this language in Antoni v. Greenhow (107 U.S. 769, 775), added: "In all such cases the question becomes, therefore, one of reasonableness, and of that the legislature is primarily the judge."

The obligations of a contract are impaired by a law which renders them invalid, or releases or extinguishes them[9] (Sturges v. Crowninshield, supra, pp. 197, 198) and impairment, as above noted, has been predicated of laws which without destroying contracts derogate from substantial contractual rights.[10] In Sturges v. Crowninshield, supra, a State insolvent law, which discharged the debtor from liability was held to be invalid as applied to contracts in existence when the law was passed. (See Ogden v. Saunders, supra.) In Green v. Biddle (8 Wheat. 1) the legislative acts, which were successfully assailed, exempted the occupant of land from the payment of rents and profits to the rightful owner and were "parts of a system the object of which was to compel the rightful owner to relinquish his lands or pay for all lasting improvements made upon them, without his consent or default." In Bronson v. Kinzie (1 How. 311), State legislation, which had been enacted for the relief of debtors in view of the seriously depressed condition of business,[11] following the panic of 1837, and which provided that the equitable estate of the mortgagor should not be extinguished for 12 months after sale on foreclosure, and further prevented any sale unless two thirds of the appraised value of the property should be bid therefor, was held to violate the constitutional provision. It will be observed that in the Bronson case, aside from the requirement as to the amount of the bid at the sale, the extension of the period of redemption was unconditional, and there was no provision, as in the instant case, to secure to the mortgagee the rental value of the property during the extended period. McCracken v. Hayward (2 How. 608), Gantly's Lessee v. Ewing (3 How. 707), and Howard v. Bugbee (24 How. 461) followed the decision in Bronson v. Kinzie; that of McCracken, condemning a statute which provided that an execution sale should not be made of property unless it would bring two thirds of its value according to the opinion of three householders; that of Gantly's lessee, condemning a statute which required a sale for not less than one half the appraised value; and that of Howard, making a similar ruling as to an unconditional extension of 2 years for redemption from foreclosure sale. In Planters' Bank v. Sharp (6 How. 301) a State law was found to be invalid which prevented a bank from transferring notes and bills receivable which it had been duly authorized to acquire. In Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, supra, a statute which restricted the power of taxation which had previously been given to provide for the payment of municipal bonds was set aside. Louisiana v. Police Jury (111 U.S. 716) and Seibert v. Lewis (122 U.S. 284) are similar cases. In Walker v. Whitehead (16 Wall. 314) the statute, which was held to be repugnant to the contract clause, was enacted in 1870 and provided that in all suits pending on any debt or contract made before June 1, 1865, the plaintiff should not have a verdict unless it appeared that all taxes chargeable by law on the same had been duly paid for each year since the contract was made; and, further, that in all cases of indebtedness of the described class the defendant might offset any losses he had suffered in consequence of the late war, either from destruction or depreciation of property. (See Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U.S. 415, 419.) In Gunn v. Barry (15 Wall. 610) and Edwards v. Kearzey (96 U.S. 595) statutes applicable to prior contracts were condemned because of increases in the amount of the property of judgment debtors which were exempted from levy and sale on execution. But, in Penniman's case (103 U.S. 714, 720) the court decided that a statute abolishing imprisonment for debt did not, within the meaning of the Constitution, impair the obligation of contracts previously made;[12] and the court said: "The general doctrine of this court on this subject may be thus stated: In modes of proceeding and forms to enforce the contract the legislature has the control, and may enlarge, limit or alter them, provided it does not deny a remedy or so embarrass it with conditions or restrictions as seriously to impair the value of the right." In Barnitz v. Beverly (163 U.S. 118) the court held that a statute which authorized the redemption of property sold on foreclosure, where no right of redemption previously existed, or which extended the period of redemption beyond the time formerly allowed, could not constitutionally apply to a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage. This ruling was to the same effect as that in Bronson v. Kinzie, supra, and Howard v. Bugbee, supra. But in the Barnitz case the statute contained a provision for the prevention of waste and authorized the appointment of a receiver of the premises sold. Otherwise the extension of the period for redemption was unconditional, and in case a receiver was appointed, the income during the period allowed for redemption, except what was necessary for repairs and to prevent waste, was still to go to the mortgagor.

[8] Contracts, within the meaning of the clause, have been held to embrace those that are executed, that is, grants, as well as those that are executory (Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 137; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43). They embrace the charters of private corporations (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518). But not the marriage contract, so as to limit the general right to legislate on the subject of divorce (Id., p. 629; Maynard v. Hill, 125 U.S. 190, 210). Nor are judgments, though rendered upon contracts, deemed to be within the provision (Morley v. Lake Shore Railway Co., 146 U.S. 162, 169). Nor does a general law, giving the consent of a State to be sued, constitute a contract (Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How. 527).

[9] But there is held to be no impairment by a law which removes the taint of illegality and thus permits enforcement, as, e.g., by repeal of a statute making a contract void for usury (Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U.S. 143, 151).

None of these cases, and we have cited those upon which appellant chiefly relies, is directly applicable to the question now before us in view of the conditions with which the Minnesota statute seeks to safeguard the interests of the mortgagee-purchaser during the extended period. And broad expressions contained in some of these opinions went beyond the requirements of the decision and are not controlling (Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 399).

Not only is the constitutional provision qualified by the measure of control which the State retains over remedial processes,[13] but the State also continues to possess authority to safeguard the vital interests of its people. It does not matter that legislation appropriate to that end "has the result of modifying or abrogating contracts already in effect" (Stephenson v. Binford, 287 U.S. 251, 276). Not only are existing laws read into contracts in order to fix obligations as between the parties, but the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts as a postulate of the legal order. The policy of protecting contracts against impairment presupposes the maintenance of a government by virtue of which contractual relations are worth while—a government which retains adequate authority to secure the peace and good order of society. This principle of harmonizing the constitutional prohibition with the necessary residuum of State power has had progressive recognition in the decisions of this court.

While the charters of private corporations constitute contracts, a grant of exclusive privilege is not to be implied as against the State (Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420). And all contracts are subject to the right of eminent domain (West River Bridge v. Dix, 6 How. 507).[14] The reservation of this necessary authority of the State is deemed to be a part of the contract. In the case last cited, the court answered the forcible challenge of the State's power by the following statement of the controlling principle—a statement reiterated by this court speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, nearly 50 years later, in Long Island Water Supply Co. v. Brooklyn (166 U.S. 685, 692): "But into all contracts, whether made between States and individuals, or between individuals only, there enter conditions which arise not out of the literal terms of the contract itself; they are superinduced by the preexisting and higher authority of the laws of nature, of nations, or of the community to which the parties belong; they are always presumed, and must be presumed, to be known and recognized by all, are binding upon all, and need never, therefore, be carried into express stipulation, for this could add nothing to their force. Every contract is made in subordination to them, and must yield to their control, as conditions inherent and paramount, wherever a necessity for their execution shall occur."

The legislature cannot "bargain away the public health or the public morals." Thus, the constitutional provision against the impairment of contracts was held not to be violated by an amendment of the State constitution which put an end to a lottery theretofore authorized by the legislature. (Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U.S. 814, 819; see also, Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U.S. 488, 497–499; compare New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U.S. 265, 275.) The lottery was a valid enterprise when established under express State authority, but the legislature in the public interest could put a stop to it. A similar rule has been applied to the control by the State of the sale of intoxicating liquors. (Beer Company v. Massachusetts, 97 U.S. 25, 32, 33; see Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U.S. 623, 664, 665.) The States retain adequate power to protect the public health against the maintenance of nuisances despite insistence upon existing contracts. (Fertilizing Company v. Hyde Park, 97 U.S. 659, 667; Butchers' Union Company v. Crescent City Company, 111 U.S. 746, 750.) Legislation to protect the public safety comes within the same category of reserved power (Chicago, B. & Q. R.R. Co. v. Nebraska, 170 U.S. 57, 70, 74; Texas & N. O. R.R. Co. v. Miller, 221 U.S. 408, 414; Atlantic Coast Line R.R. Co. v. Goldsboro, 232 U.S. 548, 558). This principle has had recent and noteworthy application to the regulation of the use of public highways by common carriers and "contract carriers", where the assertion of interference with existing contract rights has been without avail (Sproles v. Binford, 286 U.S. 374, 390, 391; Stephenson v. Binford, supra).

The economic interests of the State may justify the exercise of its continuing and dominant protective power notwithstanding interference with contracts. In Manigault v. Spring (199 U.S. 473), riparian owners in South Carolina had made a contract for a clear passage through a creek by the removal of existing obstructions. Later, the legislature of the State, by virtue of its broad authority to make public improvements, and in order to increase the taxable value of the lowlands which would be drained, authorized the construction of a dam across the creek. The Court sustained the statute upon the ground that the private interests were subservient to the public right. The Court said (id., p. 480): "It is the settled law of this court that the interdiction of statutes impairing the obligation of contracts does not prevent the State from exercising such powers as are vested in it for the promotion of the commonweal, or are necessary for the general good of the public, though contracts previously entered into between individuals may thereby be affected. This power, which in its various ramifications is known as the police power, is an exercise of the sovereign right of the Government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort, and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals." A statute of New Jersey prohibiting the transportation of water of the State into any other State was sustained against the objection that the statute impaired the obligation of contracts which had been made for furnishing such water to persons without the State (Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U.S. 349). Said the Court, by Mr. Justice Holmes (id., p. 357): "One whose rights, such as they are, are subject to State restriction, cannot remove them from the power of the State by making a contract about them. The contract will carry with it the infirmity of the subject matter." The general authority of the legislature to regulate, and thus to modify, the rates charged by public-service corporations affords another illustration (Stone v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 116 U.S. 307, 325, 326). In Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Public Service Corporation (248 U.S. 372), a statute fixing reasonable rates, to be charged by a corporation for supplying electricity to the inhabitants of a city, superseded lower rates which had been agreed upon by a contract previously made for a definite term between the company and a consumer. The validity of the statute was sustained. To the same effect are Producers Transportation Co. v. Railroad Commission (251 U.S. 228, 232), and Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. Railroad Commission (279 U.S. 125, 138). Similarly, where the protective power of the State is exercised in a manner otherwise appropriate in the regulation of a business it is no objection that the performance of existing contracts may be frustrated by the prohibition of injurious practices. (Rast v. Van Deman & Lewis Co., 240 U.S. 342, 363; see, also, St. Louis Poster Advertising Co. v. St. Louis, 249 U.S. 269, 274.)

The argument is pressed that in the cases we have cited the obligation of contracts was affected only incidentally. This argument proceeds upon a misconception. The question is not whether the legislative action affects contracts incidentally, or directly or indirectly, but whether the legislation is addressed to a legitimate end and the measures taken are reasonable and appropriate to that end. Another argument, which comes more closely to the point, is that the State power may be addressed directly to the prevention of the enforcement of contracts only when these are of a sort which the legislature in its discretion may denounce as being in themselves hostile to public morals, or public health, safety or welfare, or where the prohibition is merely of injurious practices; that interference with the enforcement of other and valid contracts according to appropriate legal procedure, although the interference is temporary and for a public purpose, is not permissible. This is but to contend that in the latter case the end is not legitimate in the view that it cannot be reconciled with a fair interpretation of the constitutional provision.

Undoubtedly, whatever is reserved of State power must be consistent with the fair intent of the constitutional limitation of that power. The reserved power cannot be construed so as to destroy the limitation, nor is the limitation to be construed to destroy the reserved power in its essential aspects. They must be construed in harmony with each other. This principle precludes a construction which would permit the State to adopt as its policy the repudiation of debts or the destruction of contracts or the denial of means to enforce them. But it does not follow that conditions may not arise in which a temporary restraint of enforcement may be consistent with the spirit and purpose of the constitutional provision and thus be found to be within the range of the reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community. It cannot be maintained that the constitutional prohibition should be so construed as to prevent limited and temporary interpositions with respect to the enforcement of contracts if made necessary by a great public calamity such as fire, flood, or earthquake. (See American Land Co. v. Zweiss, 219 U.S. 47.) The reservation of State power appropriate to such extraordinary conditions may be deemed to be as much a part of all contracts, as is the reservation of State power to protect the public interest in the other situations to which we have referred. And if State power exists to give temporary relief from the enforcement of contracts in the presence of disasters due to physical causes such as fire, flood or earthquake, that power cannot be said to be nonexistent when the urgent public need demanding such relief is produced by other and economic causes.

Whatever doubt there may have been that the protective power of the State, its police power, may be exercised—without violating the true intent of the provision of the Federal Constitution—in directly preventing the immediate and literal enforcement of contractual obligations by a temporary and conditional restraint, where vital public interests would otherwise suffer, was removed by our decisions relating to the enforcement of provisions of leases during a period of scarcity of housing (Block v. Hirsh, 256 U.S. 135; Marcus Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman, 256 U.S. 170; Edgar A. Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, 258 U.S. 242). The case of Block v. Hirsh, supra, arose in the District of Columbia and involved the due process clause of the fifth amendment. The cases of the Marcus Brown Co. and the Levy Leasing Co. arose under legislation of New York and the constitutional provision against the impairment of the obligation of contracts was invoked. The statutes of New York,[15] declaring that a public emergency existed, directly interfered with the enforcement of covenants for the surrender of the possession of premises on the expiration of leases. Within the city of New York and contiguous counties, the owners of dwellings, including apartment and tenement houses (but excepting buildings under construction in September 1920, lodging houses for transients and the larger hotels), were wholly deprived until November 1, 1922, of all possessory remedies for the purpose of removing from their premises the tenants or occupants in possession when the laws took effect (save in certain specified instances) providing the tenants or occupants were ready, able and willing to pay a reasonable rent or price for their use and occupation (People v. La Fetra, 230 N.Y. 429, 438; Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, id., 634). In the case of the Marcus Brown Co. the facts were thus stated by the Circuit Court of Appeals (269 Fed. 306, 312): "* * * the tenant defendants herein, by law older than the State of New York, became, at the landlord's option, trespassers on October 1, 1920. Plaintiff had then found and made a contract with a tenant it liked better, and had done so before these statutes were enacted. By them plaintiff is, after defendants elected to remain in possession, forbidden to carry out his bargain with the tenant he chose, the obligation of the covenant for peaceable surrender by defendants is impaired, and for the next 2 years Feldman et al. may, if they like, remain in plaintiff's apartment, provided they make good, month by month, the allegation of their answer, i.e., pay what 'a court of competent jurisdiction' regards as fair and reasonable compensation for such enforced use and occupancy." Answering the contention that the legislation as thus applied contravened the constitutional prohibition, this court, after referring to its opinion in Block v. Hirsh, supra, said: "In the present case more emphasis is laid upon the impairment of the obligation of the contract of the lessees to surrender possession and of the new lease which was to have gone into effect upon October 1 last year. But contracts are made subject to this exercise of the power of the State when otherwise justified, as we have held this to be" (256 U.S., p. 198). This decision was followed in the case of the Levy Leasing Co., supra.

In these cases of leases, it will be observed that the relief afforded was temporary and conditional; that it was sustained because of the emergency due to scarcity of housing; and that provision was made for reasonable compensation to the landlord during the period he was prevented from regaining possession. The court also decided that while the declaration by the legislature as to the existence of the emergency was entitled to great respect, it was not conclusive; and, further, that a law "depending upon the existence of an emergency or other certain state of facts to uphold it may cease to operate if the emergency ceases or the facts change even though valid when passed." It is always open to judicial inquiry whether the exigency still exists upon which the continued operation of the law depends. (Chastleton Corporation v. Sinclair), 264 U.S. 543, 547, 548).

It is manifest from this review of our decisions that there has been a growing appreciation of public needs and of the necessity of finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare. The settlement and consequent contraction of the public domain, the pressure of a constantly increasing density of population, the interrelation of the activities of our people and the complexity of our economic interests, have inevitably led to an increased use of the organization of society in order to protect the very bases of individual opportunity. Where, in earlier days, it was thought that only the concerns of individuals or of classes were involved, and that those of the State itself were touched only remotely, it has later been found that the fundamental interests of the State are directly affected; and that the question is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but of the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends.

It is no answer to say that this public need was not apprehended a century ago, or to insist that what the provision of the Constitution meant to the vision of that day it must mean to the vision of our time. If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning, "We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding" (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 407) "a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs" (id., p. 415). When we are dealing with the words of the Constitution, said this Court in Missouri v. Holland (252 U.S. 416, 433), "We must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. * * * The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago."

Nor is it helpful to attempt to draw a fine distinction between the intended meaning of the words of the Constitution and their intended application. When we consider the contract clause and the decisions which have expounded it in harmony with the essential reserved power of the States to protect the security of their peoples, we find no warrant for the conclusion that the clause has been warped by these decisions from its proper significance or that the founders of our Government would have interpreted the clause differently had they had occasion to assume that responsibility in the conditions of the later day. The vast body of law which has been developed was unknown to the fathers but it is believed to have preserved the essential content and the spirit of the Constitution. With a growing recognition of public needs and the relation of individual right to public security, the court has sought to prevent the perversion of the clause through its use as an instrument to throttle the capacity of the States to protect their fundamental interests. This development is a growth from the seeds which the fathers planted. It is a development forecast by the prophetic words of Justice Johnson in Ogden v. Saunders, already quoted. And the germs of the later decisions are found in the early cases of the Charles River Bridge and the West River Bridge, supra, which upheld the public right against strong insistence upon the contract clause. The principle of this development is, as we have seen, that the reservation of the reasonable exercise of the protective power of the State is read into all contracts and there is no greater reason for refusing to apply this principle to Minnesota mortgages than to New York leases.

Applying the criteria established by our decisions we conclude:

1. An emergency existed in Minnesota which furnished a proper occasion for the exercise of the reserve power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community. The declarations of the existence of this emergency by the legislature and by the Supreme Court of Minnesota cannot be regarded as a subterfuge or as lacking in adequate basis (Block v. Hirsh, supra). The finding of the legislature and State court has support in the facts of which we take judicial notice (Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. United States, 284 U.S. 248, 260). It is futile to attempt to make a comparative estimate of the seriousness of the emergency shown in the leasing cases from New York and of the emergency disclosed here. The particular facts differ, but that there were in Minnesota conditions urgently demanding relief, if power existed to give it, is beyond cavil. As the Supreme Court of Minnesota said, the economic emergency which threatened "the loss of homes and lands which furnish those in possession the necessary shelter and means of subsistence" was a "potent cause" for the enactment of the statute.

2. The legislation was addressed to a legitimate end, that is, the legislation was not for the mere advantage of particular individuals but for the protection of a basic interest of society.

3. In view of the nature of the contracts in question—mortgages of unquestionable validity—the relief afforded and justified by the emergency, in order not to contravene the constitutional provision, could only be of a character appropriate to that emergency and could be granted only upon reasonable conditions.

4. The conditions upon which the period of redemption is extended do not appear to be unreasonable. The initial extension of the time of redemption for 30 days from the approval of the act was obviously to give a reasonable opportunity for the authorized application to the court. As already noted, the integrity of the mortgage indebtedness is not impaired; interest continues to run; the validity of the sale and the right of a mortgagee-purchaser to title or to obtain a deficiency judgment, if the mortgagor fails to redeem within the extended period, are maintained; and the conditions of redemption, if redemption there be, stand as they were under the prior law. The mortgagor during the extended period is not ousted from possession, but he must pay the rental value of the premises as ascertained in judicial proceedings and this amount is applied to the carrying of the property and to interest upon the indebtedness. The mortgagee-purchaser during the time that he cannot obtain possession thus is not left without compensation for the withholding of possession. Also important is the fact that mortgagees, as is shown by official reports of which we may take notice, are predominantly corporations, such as insurance companies, banks, and investment and mortgage companies.[16] These, and such individual mortgagees as are small investors, are not seeking homes or the opportunity to engage in farming. Their chief concern is the reasonable protection of their investment security. It does not matter that there are, or may be, individual cases of another aspect. The legislature was entitled to deal with the general or typical situation. The relief afforded by the statute has regard to the interest of mortgagees as well as to the interest of mortgagors. The legislation seeks to prevent the impending ruin of both by a considerate measure of relief.

In the absence of legislation, courts of equity have exercised jurisdiction in suits for the foreclosure of mortgages to fix the time and terms of sale and to refuse to confirm sales upon equitable grounds where they were found to be unfair or inadequacy of price was so gross as to shock the conscience.[17] The "equity of redemption" is the creature of equity. While courts of equity could not alter the legal effect of the forfeiture of the estate at common law on breach of condition, they succeeded, operating on the conscience of the mortgagee, in maintaining that it was unreasonable that he should retain for his own benefit what was intended as a mere security; that the breach of condition was in the nature of a penalty, which ought to be relieved against, and that the mortgagor had an equity to redeem on payment of principal, interest, and costs, notwithstanding the forfeiture at law. This principle of equity was victorious against the strong opposition of the common-law judges, who thought that by "the growth of equity on equity the heart of the common law is eaten out." The equitable principle became firmly established and its application could not be frustrated even by the engagement of the debtor entered into at the time of the mortgage, the courts applying the equitable maxim "once a mortgage, always a mortgage, and nothing but a mortgage."[18] Although the courts would have no authority to alter a statutory period of redemption, the legislation in question permits the courts to extend that period within limits and upon equitable terms, thus providing a procedure and relief which are cognate to the historic exercise of the equitable jurisdiction. If it be determined, as it must be, that the contract clause is not an absolute and utterly unqualified restriction of the State's protective power, this legislation is clearly so reasonable as to be within the legislative competency.

5. The legislation is temporary in operation. It is limited to the exigency which called it forth. While the postponement of the period of redemption from the foreclosure sale is to May 1, 1935, that period may be reduced by the order of the court under the statute, in case of a change in circumstances, and the operation of the statute itself could not validly outlast the emergency or be so extended as virtually to destroy the contracts.

We are of the opinion that the Minnesota statute as here applied does not violate the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. Whether the legislation is wise or unwise as a matter of policy is a question with which we are not concerned.

What has been said on that point is also applicable to the contention presented under the due process clause (Block v. Hirsh, supra).

Nor do we think that the statute denies to the appellant the equal protection of the laws. The classification which the statute makes cannot be said to be an arbitrary one (Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 170 U.S. 283; Clark v. Titusville, 184 U.S. 329; Quong Wing v. Kirkendall, 223 U.S. 59; Ohio Oil Co. v. Conway, 281 U.S. 146; Sproles v. Binford, 286 U.S. 374).

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Minnesota is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 370.—October Term, 1933

HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION, APPELLANT, v. JOHN H. BLAISDELL AND ROSELLA BLAISDELL, HIS WIFE. APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

[Jan. 8, 1934]

Mr. Justice Sutherland, dissenting.

Few questions of greater moment than that just decided have been submitted for judicial inquiry during this generation. He simply closes his eyes to the necessary implications of the decision who fails to see in it the potentiality of future gradual but ever-advancing encroachments upon the sanctity of private and public contracts. The effect of the Minnesota legislation, though serious enough in itself, is of trivial significance compared with the far more serious and dangerous inroads upon the limitations of the Constitution which are almost certain to ensue as a consequence naturally following any step beyond the boundaries fixed by that instrument. And those of us who are thus apprehensive of the effect of this decision would, in a matter so important, be neglectful of our duty should we fail to spread upon the permanent records of the Court the reasons which move us to the opposite view.

A provision of the Constitution, it is hardly necessary to say, does not admit of two distinctly opposite interpretations. It does not mean one thing at one time and an entirely different thing at another time. If the contract-impairment clause, when framed and adopted, meant that the terms of a contract for the payment of money could not be altered in invitum by a State statute enacted for the relief of hardly pressed debtors to the end and with the effect of postponing payment or enforcement during and because of an economic or financial emergency, it is but to state the obvious to say that it means the same now. This view, at once so rational in its application to the written word, and so necessary to the stability of constitutional principles, though from time to time challenged, has never, unless recently, been put within the realm of doubt by the decisions of this Court. The true rule was forcefully declared in Ex parte Milligan (4 Wall. 2, 120–121), in the face of circumstances of national peril and public unrest and disturbance far greater than any that exist today. In that great case this Court said that the provisions of the Constitution there under consideration had been expressed by our ancestors in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, but that after the lapse of more than 70 years they were sought to be avoided. "Those great and good men", the Court said, "foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril, unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future." And then, in words the power and truth of which have become increasingly evident with the lapse of time, there was laid down the rule without which the Constitution would cease to be the "supreme law of the land", binding equally upon governments and governed at all times and under all circumstances, and become a mere collection of political maxims to be adhered to or disregarded according to the prevailing sentiment or the legislative and judicial opinion in respect of the supposed necessities of the hour:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, * * *."

Chief Justice Taney, in Dred Scott v. Sandford (19 How. 393, 426), said that while the Constitution remains unaltered it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption; that it is not only the same in words but the same in meaning, "and as long as it continues to exist in its present form, it speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers, and was voted on and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of this court, and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day." And in South Carolina v. United States (199 U.S. 437, 448–449), in an opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer, this Court quoted these words with approval and said:

"The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now. * * * Those things which are within its grants of power, as those grants were understood when made, are still within them, and those things not within them remain still excluded."

The words of Judge Campbell, speaking for the Supreme Court of Michigan in Twitchell v. Blodgett (13 Mich. 127, 139–140), are peculiarly apposite. "But it may easily happen", he said, "that specific provisions may, in unforeseen emergencies, turn out to have been inexpedient. This does not make these provisions any less binding. Constitutions cannot be changed by events alone. They remain binding as the acts of the people in their sovereign capacity, as the framers of government, until they are amended or abrogated by the action prescribed by the authority which created them. It is not competent for any department of the Government to change a constitution, or declare it changed, simply because it appears ill-adapted to a new state of things.

"* * * Restrictions have, it is true, been found more likely than grants to be unsuited to unforeseen circumstances * * *. But, where evils arise from the application of such regulations, their force cannot be denied or evaded; and the remedy consists in repeal or amendment, and not in false constructions."

The provisions of the Federal Constitution, undoubtedly, are pliable in the sense that in appropriate cases they have the capacity of bringing within their grasp every new condition which falls within their meaning.[1] But, their meaning is changeless; it is only their application which is extensible. (See South Carolina v. United States, supra, pp. 448–449.) Constitutional grants of power and restrictions upon the exercise of power are not flexible as the doctrines of the common law are flexible. These doctrines, upon the principles of the common law itself, modify or abrogate themselves whenever they are or whenever they become plainly unsuited to different or changed conditions. Funk v. United States (— U.S. —), decided December 11, 1933. The dis-

[1] In such cases it is no more necessary to modify constitutional rules to govern new conditions than it is to create new words to describe them. The commerce clause is a good example. When that was adopted its application was necessarily confined to the regulation of the primitive methods of transportation then employed: but railroads, automobiles, and aircraft automatically were brought within the scope and subject to the terms of the commerce clause the moment these new means of transportation came into existence, just as they were at once brought within the meaning of the word "carrier", as defined by the dictionaries.

tinction is clearly pointed out by Judge Cooley (1 Constitutional Limitations, 8th ed., 124):

"A principal share of the benefits expected from written constitutions would be lost if the rules they established were so flexible as to bend to circumstances or be modified by public opinion. It is with special reference to the varying moods of public opinion, and with a view to putting the fundamentals of government beyond their control, that these instruments are framed; and there can be no such steady and imperceptible change in their rules as inheres in the principles of the common law. Those beneficent maxims of the common law which guard person and property have grown and expanded until they mean vastly more to us than they did to our ancestors, and are more minute, particular, and pervading in their protections; and we may confidently look forward in the future to still further modifications in the direction of improvement. Public sentiment and action effect such changes, and the courts recognize them; but a court or legislature which should allow a change in public sentiment to influence it in giving to a written constitution a construction not warranted by the intention of its founders, would be justly chargeable with reckless disregard of official oath and public duty; and if its course could become a precedent, these instruments would be of little avail. * * * What a court is to do, therefore, is to declare the law as written, leaving it to the people themselves to make such changes as new circumstances may require. The meaning of the Constitution is fixed when it is adopted, and it is not different at any subsequent time when a court has occasion to pass upon it."

The whole aim of construction, as applied to a provision of the Constitution, is to discover the meaning, to ascertain and give effect to the intent, of its framers and the people who adopted it (Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U.S. 662, 670). The necessities which gave rise to the provision, the controversies which preceded, as well as the conflicts of opinion which were settled by its adoption, are matters to be considered to enable us to arrive at a correct result (Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U.S. 41, 95). The history of the times, the state of things existing when the provision was framed and adopted, should be looked to in order to ascertain the mischief and the remedy (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 657, 723: Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. 410, 431–432). As nearly as possible we should place ourselves in the condition of those who framed and adopted it (Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 12). And if the meaning be at all doubtful, the doubt should be resolved, wherever reasonably possible to do so, in a way to forward the evident purpose with which the provision was adopted (Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 602; Jarrolt v. Moberly, 103 U.S. 580, 586).

An application of these principles to the question under review removes any doubt, if otherwise there would be any, that the contract-impairment clause denies to the several States the power to mitigate hard consequences resulting to debtors from financial or economic exigencies by an impairment of the obligation of contracts of indebtedness. A candid consideration of the history and circumstances which led up to and accompanied the framing and adoption of this clause will demonstrate conclusively that it was framed and adopted with the specific and studied purpose of preventing legislation designed to relieve debtors especially in time of financial distress. Indeed, it is not probable that any other purpose was definitely in the minds of those who composed the framers' convention or the ratifying State conventions which followed, although the restriction has been given a wider application upon principles clearly stated by Chief Justice Marshall in the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat. 518, 644–645).

Following the Revolution, and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, the American people found themselves in a greatly impoverished condition. Their commerce had been well-nigh annihilated. They were not only without luxuries, but in great degree were destitute of the ordinary comforts and necessities of life. In these circumstances they incurred indebtedness in the purchase of imported goods and otherwise far beyond their capacity to pay. From this situation there arose a divided sentiment. On the one hand, an exact observance of public and private engagements was insistently urged. A violation of the faith of the Nation or the pledges of the private individual, it was insisted, was equally forbidden by the principles of moral justice and of sound policy. Individual distress, it was urged, should be alleviated only by industry and frugality, not by relaxation of law or by a sacrifice of the rights of others. Indiscretion or imprudence was not to be relieved by legislation, but restrained by the conviction that a full compliance with contracts would be exacted. On the other hand, it was insisted that the case of the debtor should be viewed with tenderness; and efforts were constantly directed toward relieving him from an exact compliance with his contract. As a result of the latter view, State laws were passed suspending the collection of debts, remitting or suspending the collection of taxes, providing for the emission of paper money, delaying legal proceedings, etc. There followed, as there must always follow from such a course, a long trail of ills, one of the direct consequences being a loss of confidence in the Government and in the good faith of the people. Bonds of men whose ability to pay their debts was unquestionable could not be negotiated except at a discount of 30, 40, or 50 percent. Real property could be sold only at a ruinous loss. Debtors, instead of seeking to meet their obligations by painful effort, by industry and economy, began to rest their hopes entirely upon legislative interference. The impossibility of payment of public or private debts was widely asserted, and in some instances threats were made of suspending the administration of justice by violence. The circulation of depreciated currency became common. Resentment against lawyers and courts was freely manifested, and in many instances the course of the law was arrested and judges restrained from proceeding in the execution of their duty by popular and tumultuous assemblages. This state of things alarmed all thoughtful men, and led them to seek some effective remedy (Marshall, Life of Washington (1807), vol. 5, pp. 88–131).

That this brief outline of the situation is entirely accurate is borne out by all contemporaneous history, as well as by writers of distinction of a later period.[2] (Compare Edwards v. Kearzey, 96

[2] Thus McMaster (History of the People of the United States, vol. 1, p. 425), after referring to the conditions in Rhode Island, where "the bonds of society were dissolved by paper money and tender laws"; in New Jersey, where the people nailed up the doors of their court houses; in Virginia, where the debtors "set fire to theirs in order to stop the course of justice", says:

"The newspapers were full of bankrupt notices. The farmers' taxes amounted to near the rent of their farms. Mechanics wandered up and down the streets of every city destitute of work. Ships, shut out from every port of Europe, lay rotting in the harbors."

Channing (History of the United States, vol. 3, pp. 410–411, 482–483) paints this graphic picture of the situation:

"Nowhere was the immediate prospect more gloomy than in South Carolina. * * * In Massachusetts, at the other end of the line, the case was as bad, if not worse * * * the resources of New England were insufficient to pay even what was then owing. The case of New York was even more desperate, and for the moment Philadelphia alone seemed prosperous, for the wastage of the later years of the war had been severely felt in Virginia. * * *

"* * * Virginia was honeycombed with debt. * * *

"In South Carolina the planters were even more heavily in debt. * * * The case of Thomas Bee is to the point. His creditors had secured executions against him; the sheriff had seized his property and had sold it at one thirteenth of what it would have brought at private sale in ordinary times."

Nevins (The American States During and After the Revolution, p. 536) says:

"The town of Greenwich computed that during each of the 5 years preceding 1786 the farmers had paid in taxes the entire rental value of their land."

John Fiske (The Critical Period of American History, 8th ed., pp. 175, 180) thus describes conditions:

"* * * about the market-places men spent their time angrily discussing politics, and scarcely a day passed without street fights, which at times grew into riots. In the country, too, no less than in the cities, the goddess of discord reigned. The farmers determined to starve the city people into submission, and they entered into an agreement not to send any produce into the cities until the merchants should open their shops and begin selling their goods for paper (money) at its face value * * * the farmers threw away their milk, used their corn for fuel, and let their apples rot on the ground. * * *

"* * * the courts were broken up by armed mobs. At Concord one Job Shattuck brought several hundred armed men into the town and surrounded the courthouse, while in a fierce harangue he declared that the time had come for wiping out all debts."

Dr. David Ramsay (History of the United States, 2d ed., 1818, vol. 3, pp. 46–47), a Member of the old Congress under the Confederation, and who lived in the midst of the events of which he speaks, says:

"The nonpayment of public debts sometimes inferred a necessity, and always furnished an apology for not discharging private contracts. Confidence between man and man received a deadly wound. Public faith being first violated, private engagements lost much of their obligatory force. * * *

"From the combined operation of these causes trade languished; credit expired; gold and silver vanished; and real property was depreciated to an extent equal to that of the depreciation of continental money. * * *"

And, finally, George Ticknor Curtis, in his History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States (vol. 1, p. 332–333):

"All contemporary evidence assures us that this (1783 to 1787) was a period of great pecuniary distress, arising from the depreciation of the vast quantities of paper money issued by the Federal and State governments; from rash speculations; from the uncertain and fluctuating condition of trade; and from the great amount of foreign goods forced into the country as soon as its ports were opened. Naturally, in such a state of things, the debtors were disposed to lean in favor of those systems of government and legislation which would tend to relieve or postpone the payment of their debts; and as such relief could come only from their State governments, they were naturally the friends of State rights and State authority, and were consequently not friendly to any enlargement of the powers of the Federal Constitution. The same causes which led individuals to look to legislation for irregular relief from the burden of their private contracts, led them also to regard public obligations with similar impatience. Opposed to this numerous class of persons were all those who felt the high necessity of preserving inviolate every public and private obligation; who saw that the separate power of the States could not accomplish what was absolutely necessary to sustain both public and private credit; and they were as naturally disposed to look to the resources of the Union for these benefits as the other class were to look in an opposite direction. These tendencies produced in nearly every State a struggle, not as between two organized parties, but one that was all along a contest for supremacy between opposite opinions, in which it was at one time doubtful to which side the scale would turn."

U.S. 595, 604–607.) The appended note might be extended for many pages by the addition of similar quotations from the same and other writers, but enough appears to establish beyond all question the extreme gravity of the emergency, the great difficulty and frequent impossibility which confronted debtors generally in any effort to discharge their obligations.

In an attempt to meet the situation recourse was had to the legislatures of the several States under the Confederation; and these bodies passed, among other acts, the following: Laws providing for the emission of bills of credit and making them legal tender for the payment of debts, and providing also for such payment by the delivery of specific property at a fixed valuation; installment laws, authorizing payment of overdue obligations at future intervals of time; stay laws and laws temporarily closing access to the courts; and laws discriminating against British creditors. I have selected, out of a vast number, a few historical comments upon the character and effect of these legislative devices.[3]

In the midst of this confused, gloomy, and seriously exigent condition of affairs, the Constitutional Convention of 1787 met at Philadelphia. The defects of the Articles of Confederation were so great as to be beyond all hope of amendment, and the Convention, acting in technical excess of its authority, proceeded to frame for submission to the people of the several States an entirely new Constitution. Shortly prior to the meeting of the Convention, Madison had assailed a bill pending in the Virginia Assembly, proposing the payment of private debts in three annual installments, on the ground that "no legislative principle could vindicate such an interposition of the law in private contracts." The bill was lost by a single vote.[4] Pelatiah Webster had likewise assailed similar laws as altering the value of contracts; and William Paterson, of New Jersey, had insisted that "the legislature should leave the parties to the law under which they contracted."[5]

In the plan of government especially urged by Sherman and Ellsworth there was an article proposing that the legislatures of the individual States ought not to possess a right to emit bills of credit, etc., "or in any manner to obstruct or impede the recovery of debts, whereby the interests of foreigners or the citizens of any other State may be affected."[6] And on July 13, 1787, Congress in New York, acutely conscious of the evils engendered by State laws interfering with existing contracts,[7] passed the Northwest Territory Ordinance, which contained the clause: "And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said Territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed."[8] It is not surprising, therefore, that, after the Convention had adopted the clauses, no State shall "emit bills of credit", or "make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts" Mr. King moved to add a "prohibition on the States to interfere in private contracts." This was opposed by Gouverneur Morris and Colonel Mason. Colonel Mason thought that this would be carrying the restraint too far; that cases would happen that could not be foreseen where some kind of interference would be essential. This was on August 28. But Mason's view did not prevail, for, on September 14 following, the first clause of article I, section 10, was altered so as to include the provision, "No State shall * * * pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts", and in that form it was adopted.[9]

Luther Martin, in an address to the Maryland House of Delegates, declared his reasons for voting against the provision. He said that he considered there might be times of such great public calamity and distress as should render it the duty of a government in some measure to interfere by passing laws totally or partially stopping courts of justice, or authorizing the debtor to pay by installments; that such regulations had been found necessary in most or all of the States "to prevent the wealthy creditor and the moneyed man from totally destroying the poor, though industrious debtor. Such times may again arrive." And he was apprehensive of any proposal which took from the respective States the power to give their debtor citizens "a moment's indulgence, however necessary it might be, and however desirous to grant them aid."[10]

On the other hand, Sherman and Ellsworth defended the provision in a letter to the Governor of Connecticut.[11] In the course of the Virginia debates, Randolph declared that the prohibition would be promotive of virtue and justice, and preventive of injustice and fraud; and he pointed out that the reputation of the people had suffered because of frequent interferences by the State legislatures with private contracts.[12] In the North Carolina debates, Mr. Davie declared that the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts and other restrictions ought to supersede the laws of particular States. He thought the constitutional provisions were founded on the strongest principles of justice.[13] Pinckney, in the South Carolina debates, said that he considered the section including the clause in question as "the soul of the Constitution", teaching the States "to cultivate those principles of public honor and private honesty which are the sure road to national character and happiness."[14]

[3] Charles Warren, The Making of the Constitution (pp. 5–6):

"The actual evils which led to the Federal Convention of 1787 are familiar to every reader of history and need no detailed description here. As is well known, they arose, in general, * * *; second, from State legislation unjust to citizens and productive of dissensions with neighboring States—the State laws particularly complained of being those staying process of the courts, making property a tender in payment of debts, issuing paper money, interfering with foreclosure of mortgages, * * *."

Fiske, supra, note 2, p. 168:

"By 1786, under the universal depression and want of confidence, all trade had wellnigh stopped, and political quackery, with its cheap and dirty remedies, had full control of the field. * * * a craze for fictitious wealth in the shape of paper money ran like an epidemic through the country. There was a Barmecide feast of economic vagaries; * * * And when we have threaded the maze of this rash legislation, we shall the better understand that clause in our Federal Constitution which forbids the making of laws impairing the obligation of contracts."

Beard, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States (pp. 31–32):

"Money capital was * * * being positively attacked by the makers of paper money, stay laws, pine barren acts, and other devices for depreciating the currency or delaying the collection of debts. In addition there was a wide-spread derangement of the monetary system * * *

"Creditors, naturally enough, resisted all of these schemes in the State legislatures, and * * * turned to the idea of a National Government so constructed as to prevent laws impairing the obligation of contract, emitting paper money, and otherwise benefiting debtors. It is idle to inquire whether the rapacity of the creditors or the total depravity of the debtors * * * was responsible for this deep and bitter antagonism. It is sufficient for our purposes to discover its existence and to find its institutional reflex in the Constitution."

Fisher Ames, Eulogy on Washington, The Life and Works of Fisher Ames (vol. 2, p. 76):

"Accordingly, in some of the States creditors were treated as outlaws; bankrupts were armed with legal authority to be persecutors; and by the shock of all confidence and faith, society was shaken to its foundations."

Illuminating comment upon some of this State legislation is to be found in chapter VI (vol. 1) of Bancroft's History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States under the heading, "State laws impairing the obligation of contracts prove the need of an overruling Union" (pp. 230–236):

"[In Massachusetts] Repeated temporary stay laws gave no real relief; they flattered and deceived the hope of the debtor, exasperating alike him and his creditor. * * *

"* * * [In Pennsylvania] in December 1784 debts contracted before 1777 were made payable in three annual installments. * * *

"Maryland, * * * In 1782 * * * enacted a stay law extending to January 1784, * * *.

"Georgia, in August 1782 stayed execution for 2 years from and after the passing of the act. * * *

"* * * [In South Carolina in 1782] the commencement of suits was suspended till 10 days after the sitting of the next general assembly. * * * On the 26th day of March 1784 came the great ordinance for the payment of debts in four annual installments, * * *"

Ramsay, supra, note 2, vol. 3, 65–66, 106:

"The distrust which prevailed among the people respecting the punctual fulfillment of contracts arose from the powers claimed, and, in too many instances, exercised by the State legislatures, for impairing the obligation of contracts. * * * These prolific sources of evil were completely done away by the new constitution. * * *

"* * * State legislatures, in too many instances, yielded to the necessities of their constituents and passed laws by which creditors were compelled either to wait for payment of their just demands, on the tender of security, or to take property, at a valuation, or paper money falsely purporting to be the representative of specie. These laws were considered by the British as inconsistent with * * * the treaty, * * * The Americans palliated these measures by the plea of necessity; * * *"

Ramsay, The History of South Carolina (1809) (vol. 2, pp. 429–430);

"The effects of these laws interfering between debtors and creditors were extensive. They destroyed public credit and confidence between man and man; injured the morals of the people, and in many instances insured and aggravated the final ruin of the unfortunate debtors for whose temporary relief they were brought forward."

Mr. Warren, in his book The Making of the Constitution (pp. 552–555), has an interesting résumé of the proceedings in the Convention and of the conflicting views which were before the State conventions for consideration. He says in part:

The provision was strongly defended in The Federalist, both by Hamilton in no. 7 and Madison in no. 44. Madison concluded his defense of the clause by saying:

"* * * one legislative interference is but the first link of a long chain of repetitions, every subsequent interference being naturally produced by the effects of the preceding. They very rightly infer, therefore, that some thorough reform is wanting, which will banish speculations on public measures, inspire a general prudence and industry, and give a regular course to the business of society."

Contemporaneous history is replete with evidence of the sharp conflict of opinion with respect to the advisability of adopting the clause. Dr. Ramsay (The History of South Carolina (1809), vol. 2, pp. 431–433), already referred to, writing of the action of South Carolina and especially referring to the contract impairment clause, says that this Constitution was accepted and ratified on behalf of the State, and speaks of it as an act of great self-denial:

"The power thus given up by South Carolina was one she thought essential to her welfare, and had freely exercised for several preceding years. Such a relinquishment she would not have made at any period of the last 5 years; for in them she had passed no less than six acts interfering between debtor and creditor, with the view of obtaining a respite for the former under particular circumstances of public distress. To tie up the hands of future legislatures so as to deprive them of a power of repeating similar acts on any emergency, was a display both of wisdom and magnanimity. It would seem as if experience had convinced the State of its political errors, and induced a willingness to retrace its steps and relinquish a power which had been improperly used."

There is an old case, Glaze v. Drayton (1 DeS. Equ. (S.C.) 109), decided in 1784, where the South Carolina Court of Chancery entered a decree for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of land, but providing for the payment of the balance due under the contract "by installments, at the times mentioned in the acts of assembly respecting the recovery of old debts." In reporting that case soon after the adoption of the Constitution, Chancellor DeSaussure added the following explanatory and illuminating note:

"The legislature, in consideration of the distressed state of the country, after the war, had passed an act, preventing the immediate recovery of debts, and fixing certain periods for the payment of debts, far beyond the periods fixed by the contract of the parties. These interferences with private contracts became very common with most of the State legislatures, even after the distresses arising from the war had ceased in a great degree. They produced distrust and irritation throughout the community, to such an extent that new troubles were apprehended; and nothing contributed more to prepare the public mind for giving up a portion of the State sovereignty, and adopting an efficient national government than these abuses of power by the State legislatures."

If it be possible by resort to the testimony of history to put any question of constitutional intent beyond the domain of uncertainty, the foregoing leaves no reasonable ground upon which to base a denial that the clause of the Constitution now under consideration was meant to foreclose State action impairing the obligation of contracts primarily and especially in respect of such action aimed at giving relief to debtors in time of emergency. And if further proof be required to strengthen what already is inexpugnable, such proof will be found in the previous decisions of this court. There are many such decisions; but it is necessary to refer to a few only which bear directly upon the question, namely: Bronson v. Kinzie (1 How. 311); McCracken v. Hayward (2 How. 608); Gantly's Lessee v. Ewing (3 How. 707); Howard v. Bugbee (24 How. 461); Gunn v. Barry (15 Wall. 610); Walker v. Whitehead (16 Wall. 314); Edwards v. Kearzey (96 U.S. 595); Barnitz v. Beverly (163 U.S. 118); and Bradley v. Lightcap (195 U.S. 1).

Bronson v. Kinzie was decided at the January term, 1843. The case involved an Illinois statute, extending the period of redemption for a period of 12 months after a sale under a decree in chancery, and another statute preventing a sale unless two thirds of the amount at which the property had been valued by appraisers should be bid therefor. This Court held both statutes invalid, when applied to an existing mortgage, as infringing the contract impairment clause. No more need now be said as to the points decided. The opinion of the Court says nothing about an emergency; but it is clear that the statute was passed for the purpose of meeting the panic and depression which began in 1837 and continued for some years thereafter.[15] And in the light of what is now to be said, it is evident that the question of that emergency as a basis for the legislation was so definitely involved that it must have been considered by the Court.

The emergency was quite as serious as that which the country has faced during the past 3 years. Indeed, it was so great that in one instance, at least, a State repudiated a portion of its public debt, and others were strongly tempted to do so.[16] Mr. Warren, in his book, The Supreme Court in United States History (vol. 2, pp. 376–379), gives a vivid picture of the situation. After referring to Bronson v. Kinzie and the statute extending the period of redemption therein dealt with, he points to the prevailing state of business and finance which had called the statute into existence; to the bank failures, State debt repudiations, scarcity of hard money, the inability to pay debts except by disposing of property at ruinous prices; to the enactment of statutes for the relief of debtors, stay laws postponing collection of debts, etc., which had been passed by State after State; and to the action of this Court in striking down the State statute in the face of these conditions.

"Unquestionably", he continues, "the country owes much of its prosperity to the unflinching courage with which, in the face of attack, the Court has maintained its firm stand in behalf of high standards of business morale, requiring honest payment of debts and strict performance of contracts; and its rigid construction of the Constitution to this end has been one of the glories of the judiciary. That its decisions should, at times, have met with disfavor among the debtor class was, however, entirely natural; and while, ultimately, these debtor relief laws have always proved to be injurious to the very class they were designed to relieve and to increase the financial distress, fraud, and extortion, temporarily, debtors have always believed such laws to be their salvation and have resented judicial decisions holding them invalid. Consequently, this opinion of the Court in the Bronson case aroused great antagonism in the Western States. In Illinois, a mass meeting was held which resolved that the decision ought not to be heeded, * * *. Later, deference to the antagonism aroused against the Court by this decision was made when the Senator from Illinois, James Semple, introduced in the Senate in 1846, a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to prohibit the Supreme Court from declaring void 'any act of Congress or any State regulation on the ground that it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States * * *.'"

McMaster (supra, note 2, vol. 7, pp. 44–48), is to the same effect.

McCracken v. Hayward, decided at the January term, 1844, dealt with the same Illinois statute, but involved a sale on execution after judgment, whereas Bronson v. Kinzie involved a mortgage. The decision simply followed the Bronson case. What has been said in respect of the background and setting of that case is equally applicable and need not be repeated.

Gantly's Lessee v. Ewing was decided at the January term, 1845. It held unconstitutional, as applied to a preexisting mortgage, an act of Indiana providing that no real property should be sold on execution for less than half its appraised value. The statute, like those of Illinois, was enacted for the benefit of hard-pressed debtors as a result of the same emergency. It is referred to by McMaster, supra, as one of the "marks on the statute books" which the "evil times through which the people were passing" had left.

Howard v. Bugbee, decided at the December term, 1860, dealt with an Alabama statute authorizing a redemption of mortgaged property in 2 years after the sale under a decree. The statute was declared unconstitutional principally upon the authority of Bronson v. Kinzie. The opinion is very short and does not refer to the question of emergency. The statute was passed, however, in 1842 (the mortgage having been executed prior thereto), and was, therefore, one of the emergency statutes of that period. The Alabama Supreme Court, whose decision was under review here, so treated it, and justified the statute upon that ground (32 Ala. 713, 716–717). It is worthy of note that after the decision of this court in the Bugbee case, Judge Walker, who delivered the opinion therein for the Alabama court, filed a dissenting opinion in Ex parte Pollard, Ex parte Woods (40 Ala. 77, 110), in the course

---

"The Convention then was asked to perfect their action in favor of honesty and morality, by adding a prohibition on the States which would put an end to statutes enacting laws for special individuals, setting aside court judgments, repealing vested rights, altering corporate charters, staying the bringing or prosecution of suits, preventing foreclosure of mortgages, altering the terms of contracts, and allowing tender in payment of debts of something other than that contracted for. The State legislatures had hitherto passed such laws in abundant measure, and the situation was graphically described later by Chief Justice Marshall in one of his most noted decisions (Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 354), as follows:

"'The power of changing the relative situation of debtor and creditor, of interfering with contracts, a power which comes home to every man, touches the interest of all, and controls the conduct of every individual in those things which he supposes to be proper for his own exclusive management, had been used to such an excess by the State legislatures as to break in upon the ordinary intercourse of society and destroy all confidence between man and man. The mischief had become so great, so alarming, as not only to impair commercial intercourse and threaten the existence of credit, but to sap the morals of the people and destroy the sanctity of private faith. To guard against the continuance of the evil was an object of deep interest with all the truly wise as well as virtuous of this great community, and was one of the important benefits expected from a reform of the government.'

"To obviate the conditions thus described, King of Massachusetts proposed the insertion of a new restriction on the States. * * * Wilson and Madison supported his motion. Mason and G. Morris, however, believed that it went too far in interfering with the powers of the States. * * * There was also a genuine belief by some delegates that, under some circumstances and in financial crises, such stay and tender laws might be necessary to avert calamitous loss to debtors. * * * The other delegates had been deeply impressed by the disastrous social and economic effects of the stay and tender laws which had been enacted by most of the States between 1780 and 1786, and they decided to make similar legislation impossible in the future."

of which he said that his former opinion had been overruled by this court and he could no longer perceive any ground upon which the convictions of a legislature as to the welfare of the people could enlarge the authority to interfere, through the manipulation of the remedy, with the obligation of contracts. The basis of the legislation was, and is shown by the decision of the Alabama Supreme Court sustaining it to be, the existence of the great emergency beginning in 1837; and that question, since the Alabama decision was reviewed, was quite plainly before this Court for consideration.

Walker v. Whitehead, decided at the December term, 1872, held unconstitutional a Georgia statute requiring the plaintiff, suing on a debt or contract, to prove as a condition precedent to the entry of judgment in his favor that all legal taxes chargeable by law thereon had been duly paid for each year since the making of the debt or contract. The Georgia Supreme Court (43 Ga. 538, 544–546) had sustained the act as a measure made necessary by the desperate financial and economic conditions in that State due to the Civil War. This Court, making no response to the somewhat fervid presentation of this view of the matter by the State court, simply said that the degree of impairment was immaterial; that any impairment of the obligation of a contract is within the prohibition of the Constitution; that "a clearer case of a law impairing the obligation of a contract, within the meaning of the Constitution, can hardly occur."

Edwards v. Kearzey, decided at the October term, 1877, held invalid, as applied to a preexisting debt, the provision of the North Carolina Constitution of 1868 increasing the exemptions to which a debtor was entitled. The North Carolina Supreme Court, in a series of decisions, had sustained the State constitutional provision, principally upon the ground (Garrett v. Chesire, 69 N.C. 396, 404–405) that it was adopted at a time when "probably one half of the debtor class are owing more old debts than they can pay"; and that "if under our circumstances our people are to be left without any exemptions, the policy of Christian civilization is lost sight of * * *." In the brief of defendant in error in this Court (pp. 7–8) the view was strongly urged that the provision was not so much for the benefit of the debtor as for that of the State, to prevent the evils of almost universal pauperism. Attention was called to the desperate condition of the people of the State following the Civil War, and it was said that one third of the whole population were paupers, all their property except lands having disappeared; that one half of the people did not own land enough to afford burial for that proportion of the population; and against those who did own land the ante-war debts were piled mountain high. It was submitted that the State, on being rehabilitated, was not bound to allow the creditor to strip the few self-supporting landowners of their means of existence and thereby add them to the vast army of the impoverished, but that it had the right to defer a portion of the creditor's claim until the prostrated community had opportunity to recoup some of its losses.

This Court, in response, reviewed the history of the adoption of the contract impairment clause and held the State constitutional provision invalid. "Policy and humanity", it said, "are dangerous guides in the discussion of a legal proposition. He who follows them far is apt to bring back the means of error and delusion. The prohibition contains no qualification, and we have no judicial authority to interpolate any. [Italics added.] Our duty is simply to execute it."

Barnitz v. Beverly was decided May 18, 1896. A law of Kansas extended the period of redemption from a sale under a mortgage for a period of 18 months, during which time the mortgagor was to remain in possession and receive rents and profits, except as necessary for repairs. The act was passed in 1893 in the midst of another panic, the severity of which, still within the memory of the members of this Court, is a matter of common knowledge. The effects of that panic extended into every form of industry; bank failures were on an unprecedented scale; more than half the railroads of the country were in the hands of receivers; securities fell to 50 percent, often to 25 percent, of their former value; commercial failures and unemployment became general; heavy inroads were made upon public and private resources in caring for the hungry and destitute;[17] great bodies of idle men—the so-called "industrial armies"—marched toward Washington, feeding like locusts upon the country through which they passed.

These conditions were brought to the attention of this Court. In addition, the Supreme Court of Kansas (55 Kan. 466, 484–485), had relied upon them as a justification for the legislation, and had inquired why the State legislature in a time of general depression could not "extend the indefinite estate impliedly reserved by the mortgagor, as the Federal courts of equity do in particular cases, beyond the 6 months allowed by the general practice"?

In response to all of which, this Court, after reviewing its former decisions, held the statute invalid as applied to a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage.

The present exigency is nothing new. From the beginning of our existence as a nation, periods of depression, of industrial failure, of financial distress, of unpaid and unpayable indebtedness, have alternated with years of plenty. The vital lesson that expenditure beyond income begets poverty, that public or private extravagance, financed by promises to pay, either must end in complete or partial repudiation or the promises be fulfilled by self-denial and painful effort, though constantly taught by bitter experience, seems never to be learned; and the attempt by legislative devices to shift the misfortune of the debtor to the shoulders of the creditor without coming into conflict with the contract impairment clause has been persistent and oft-repeated.

The defense of the Minnesota law is made upon grounds which were discountenanced by the makers of the Constitution and have many times been rejected by this Court. That defense should not now succeed because it constitutes an effort to overthrow the constitutional provision by an appeal to facts and circumstances identical with those which brought it into existence. With due regard for the processes of logical thinking, it legitimately cannot be urged that conditions which produced the rule may now be invoked to destroy it.

The lower court, and counsel for the appellees in their argument here, frankly admitted that the statute does constitute a material impairment of the contract, but contended that such legislation is brought within the State power by the present emergency. If I understand the opinion just delivered, this Court is not wholly in accord with that view. The opinion concedes that emergency does not create power, or increase granted power, or remove or diminish restrictions upon power granted or reserved. It then proceeds to say, however, that while emergency does not create power, it may furnish the occasion for the exercise of power. I can only interpret what is said on that subject as meaning that while an emergency does not diminish a restriction upon power, it furnishes an occasion for diminishing it; and this, as it seems to me, is merely to say the same thing by the use of another set of words, with the effect of affirming that which has just been denied.

It is quite true that an emergency may supply the occasion for the exercise of power, depending upon the nature of the power and the intent of the Constitution with respect thereto. The emergency of war furnishes an occasion for the exercise of certain of the war powers. This the Constitution contemplates, since they cannot be exercised upon any other occasion. The existence of another kind of emergency authorizes the United States to protect each of the States of the Union against domestic violence (Constitution, art. IV, sec. 4). But we are here dealing not with a power granted by the Federal Constitution, but with the State police power, which exists in its own right. Hence the question is not whether an emergency furnishes the occasion for the exercise of that State power, but whether an emergency furnishes an occasion for the relaxation of the restrictions upon the power imposed by the contract impairment clause; and the difficulty is that the contract impairment clause forbids State action under any circumstances, if it have the effect of impairing the obligation of contracts. That clause restricts every State power in the particular specified, no matter what may be the occasion. It does not contemplate that an emergency shall furnish an occasion for softening the restriction or making it any the less a restriction upon State action in that contingency than it is under strictly normal conditions.

The Minnesota statute either impairs the obligation of contracts or it does not. If it does not, the occasion to which it relates becomes immaterial, since, then, the passage of the statute is the exercise of a normal, unrestricted, State power and requires no special occasion to render it effective. If it does, the emergency no more furnishes a proper occasion for its exercise than if the emergency were nonexistent. And so, while, in form, the suggested distinction seems to put us forward in a straight line, in reality it simply carries us back in a circle, like bewildered travelers lost in a wood, to the point where we parted company with the view of the State court.

If what has now been said is sound, as I think it is, we come to what really is the vital question in the case: Does the Minnesota statute constitute an impairment of the obligation of the contract now under review?

In answering that question we must first of all distinguish the present legislation from those statutes which, although interfering in some degree with the terms of contracts, or having the effect of entirely destroying them, have nevertheless been sustained as not impairing the obligation of contracts in the constitutional sense. Among these statutes are such as affect the remedy merely, as to which this Court said in Bronson v. Kinzie, supra (p. 316), and repeated in Edwards v. Kearzey, supra (p. 604), "Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the State, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract. But if that effect is produced, it is immaterial whether it is done by acting on the remedy or directly on the contract itself. In either case it is prohibited by the Constitution."

Another class of statutes is illustrated by those exempting from execution and sale certain classes of property, like the tools of an artisan. Chief Justice Taney, in Bronson v. Kinzie, supra, speaking obiter, said that a State might properly exempt necessary implements of agriculture, or the tools of a mechanic, or articles of necessity in household furniture. But this Court, in Edwards v. Kearzey, supra, struck down a provision of the North Carolina Constitution which exempted every homestead, and the dwelling and buildings used therewith, not exceeding in value $1,000, on the ground of its unconstitutionality as applied to a contract already in existence. Referring to the opinion in Bronson v. Kinzie, the Court said (p. 604) that the Chief Justice seems to have had in his mind the maxim "de minimis", etc. "Upon no other ground can any exemption be justified."

It is quite true also that "the reservation of essential attributes of sovereign power is also read into contracts"; and that the legislature cannot "bargain away the public health or the public morals." General statutes to put an end to lotteries, the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors, the maintenance of nuisances, to protect the public safety, etc., although they have the indirect effect of absolutely destroying private contracts previously made in contemplation of a continuance of the state of affairs then in existence but subsequently prohibited, have been uniformly upheld as not violating the contract impairment clause. The distinction between legislation of that character and the Minnesota statute, however, is readily observable. It may be demonstrated by an example. A, engaged in the business of manufacturing intoxicating liquor within a State, makes a contract, we will suppose, with B to manufacture and deliver at a stipulated price and at some date in the future a quantity of whisky. Before the day arrives for the performance of the contract the State passes a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. The contract immediately falls because its performance has ceased to be lawful. This is so because the contract is made upon the implied condition that a particular state of things shall continue to exist, "and when that state of things ceases to exist the bargain itself ceases to exist" (Marshall v. Glanvill [1917], 2 K.B. 87, 91). In that case the plaintiff had been employed by the defendants upon a contract of service. While the contract was in force the country became involved in the World War, and plaintiff was called into the military service. The court held that this rendered performance unlawful and that the contract was at an end. It said:

"Here the parties clearly made their bargain on the footing that it should continue lawful for the plaintiff to render and for the defendants to accept his services. The rendering and acceptance of these services ceased to be lawful in July 1916, and thereupon the bargain came to an end."

In In re Shipton, Anderson & Co. ([1915] 3 K.B. 676), a parcel of wheat then lying in a warehouse was sold for future payment and delivery. The wheat was subsequently requisitioned by the English Government, and the sellers became unable to deliver. The Court of King's Bench Division held that the sellers were not liable. Darling, justice, agreeing with the opinion of Lord Reading, said (pp. 683–684):

"If one contracts to do what is then illegal, the contract itself is altogether bad. If after the contract has been made it cannot be performed without what is illegal being done, there is no obligation to perform it. In the one case the making of the contract, in the other case the performance of it, is against public policy. It must be here presumed that the Crown acted legally, and there is no contention to the contrary. We are in a state of war; that is notorious. The subject matter of this contract has been seized by the state acting for the general good. Salus populi suprema lex is a good maxim, and the enforcement of that essential law gives no right of action to whomsoever may be injured by it."

The general subject is discussed by this court in Omnia Co. v. United States (261 U.S. 502), and it is there pointed out (p. 513) that the effect of such a requisition is not to appropriate the contract but to frustrate it—an essentially different thing.

The same distinction properly may be made as to the contract impairment clause, in respect of subsequent State legislation rendering unlawful a state of things which was lawful when an obligation relating thereto was contracted. By such legislation the obligation is not impaired in the constitutional sense. The contract is frustrated—it disappears in virtue of an implied condition to that effect read into the contract itself. Thus, in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Co., Ltd., v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. ([1916], 2 A.C. 397), the House of Lords had before it a case where a steamer, then subject to a charter party having nearly 3 years to run, had been requisitioned by the Admiralty. The applicable rule was there stated to be that the court should examine the contract and the circumstances in which it was made in order to see whether or not from their nature the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular state of things would continue to exist. And if they must have done so, a term to that effect would be implied, though not expressed in the contract. In Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co. ([1918], A.C. 119, 127–128, 137), that rule was reaffirmed, with the additional statement that a subsequent law might be the cause of an impossibility of performance, by taking away something from the control of the party as to which thing he had contracted to do or not to do something else; and that the court must determine whether this contingency is of such a character that it can reasonably be implied to have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.

Bearing in mind these aids toward determining whether such an implied condition may be read into a particular contract, let us revert to the example already given with respect to an agreement for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. And let us suppose that the State, instead of passing legislation prohibiting the manufacture and sale of the commodity, in which event the doctrine of implied conditions would be pertinent, continues to recognize the general lawfulness of the business, but, because of what it conceives to be a justifying emergency, provides that the time for the performance of existing contracts for future manufacture and sale shall be extended for a specified period of time. It is perfectly admissible, in view of the State power to prohibit the business, to read into the contract an implied proviso to the effect that the business of manufacturing and selling intoxicating liquors shall not, prior to the date when performance is due, become unlawful; but in the case last put, to read into the contract a pertinent provisional exception in the event of intermeddling State action would be more than unreasonable, it would be absurd, since we must assume that the contract was made on the footing that so long as the obligation remained lawful the impairment clause would effectively preclude a law altering or nullifying it however exigent the occasion might be.

That, in principle, is precisely the case here. The contract is to repay a loan within a fixed time, with the express condition that upon failure the property given as security shall be sold, and that, in the absence of a timely redemption, title shall be vested absolutely in the purchaser. This contract was lawful when made; and it has never been anything else. What the legislature has done is to pass a statute which does not have the effect of frustrating the contract by rendering its performance unlawful, but one which, at the election of one of the parties, postpones for a time the effective enforcement of the contractual obligation, notwithstanding the obligation, under the exact terms of the contract, remains lawful and possible of performance after the passage of the statute as it was before.

The Rent cases (Block v. Hirsh, 256 U.C. 135; Marcus Brown Co. v. Feldman, 256 U.S. 170; Levy Leasing Co. v. Siegel, 258 U.S. 242) which are here relied upon, dealt with an exigent situation due to a period of scarcity of housing caused by the war. I do not stop to consider the distinctions between them and the present case or to do more than point out that the question of contract impairment received little, if any, more than casual consideration. The writer of the opinions in the first two cases, speaking for this Court in a later case (Penna. Coal Co. v. Mahon, 260 U.S. 393, 416), characterized all of them as having gone "to the verge of the law." It, therefore, seems pertinent to say that decisions which confessedly escape the limbo of unconstitutionality by the exceedingly narrow margin suggested by this characterization should be applied toward the solution of a doubtful question arising in a different field with a very high degree of caution. Reasonably considered, they do not foreclose the question here involved, and it should be determined upon its merits without regard to those cases.

We come back, then, directly, to the question of impairment. As to that, the conclusion reached by the Court here seems to be that the relief afforded by the statute does not contravene the constitutional provision because it is of a character appropriate to the emergency and allowed upon what are said to be reasonable conditions.

It is necessary, first of all, to describe the exact situation. Appellees obtained from appellant a loan of $3,800; and to secure its payment, executed a mortgage upon real property consisting of land and a 14-room house and garage. The mortgage contained the conventional Minnesota provision for foreclosure by advertisement. The mortgagors agreed to pay the debt, together with interest and the taxes and insurance on the property. They defaulted; and, in strict accordance with the bargain, appellant foreclosed the mortgage by advertisement and caused the premises to be sold. Appellant itself bought the property at the sale for a sum equal to the amount of the mortgage debt. The period of redemption from that sale was due to expire on May 2, 1933; and, assuming no redemption at the end of that day, under the law in force when the contract was made and when the property was sold and in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, appellant would at once have become the owner in fee and entitled to the immediate possession of the property. The statute here under attack was passed on April 18, 1933. It first recited and declared that an economic emergency existed. As applied to the present case, it arbitrarily extended the period of redemption expiring on May 2, 1933, to May 18, 1933—a period of 16 days; and provided that the mortgagor might apply for a further extension to the district court of the county. That court was authorized to extend the period to a date not later than May 1, 1935, on the condition that the mortgagor should pay to the creditor all or a reasonable part of the income or rental value, as to the court might appear just and equitable, toward the payment of taxes, insurance, interest, and principal mortgage indebtedness, and at such times and in such manner as should be fixed by the court. The court to whom the application in this case was made extended the time until May 1, 1935, upon the condition that payment by the mortgagor of the rental value, $40 per month, should be made.

It will be observed that whether the statute operated directly upon the contract or indirectly by modifying the remedy, its effect was to extend the period of redemption absolutely for a period of 16 days, and conditionally for a period of 2 years. That this brought about a substantial change in the terms of the contract reasonably cannot be denied. If the statute was meant to operate only upon the remedy, it, nevertheless, as applied, had the effect of destroying for 2 years the right of the creditor to enjoy the ownership of the property, and consequently the correlative power, for that period, to occupy, sell, or otherwise dispose of it as might seem fit. This postponement, if it had been unconditional, undoubtedly would have constituted an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation. This Court so decided in Bronson v. Kinzie, supra, where the period of redemption was extended for a period of only 12 months after a sale under a decree; in Howard v. Bugbee, supra, where the extension was for 2 years; and in Barnitz v. Bexerly, supra, where the period was extended for 18 months. Those cases, we may assume, still embody the law, since they are not overruled.

The only substantial difference between those cases and the present one is that here the extension of the period of redemption and postponement of the creditor's ownership, is accompanied by the condition that the rental value of the property shall, in the meantime, be paid. Assuming for the moment, that a statute extending the period of redemption may be upheld if something of commensurate value be given the creditor by way of compensation, a conclusion that payment of the rental value during the 2 years' period of postponement is even the approximate equivalent of immediate ownership and possession is purely gratuitous. How can such payment be regarded, in any sense, as compensation for the postponement of the contract right? The ownership of the property to which petitioner was entitled carried with it not only the right to occupy or sell it, but, ownership being retained, the right to the rental value as well. So that in the last analysis petitioner simply is allowed to retain a part of what is its own as compensation for surrendering the remainder. Moreover, it cannot be foreseen what will happen to the property during that long period of time. The buildings may deteriorate in quality; the value of the property may fall to a sum far below the purchase price; the financial needs of appellant may become so pressing as to render it urgently necessary that the property shall be sold for whatever it may bring.

However these or other supposable contingencies may be, the statute denies appellant for a period of 2 years the ownership and possession of the property—an asset which, in any event, is of substantial character, and which possibly may turn out to be of great value. The statute, therefore, is not merely a modification of the remedy; it effects a material and injurious change in the obligation. The legally enforceable right of the creditor when the statute was passed was, at once upon default of redemption, to become the fee simple owner of the property. Extension of the time for redemption for 2 years, whatever compensation be given in its place, destroys that specific right and the correlative obligation, and does so none the less though it assume to create in invitum another and different right and obligation of equal value. Certainly, if A should contract with B to deliver a specified quantity of wheat on or before a given date, legislation, however much it might purport to act upon the remedy, which had the effect of permitting the contract to be discharged by the delivery of corn of equal value, would subvert the constitutional restriction.

A statute which materially delays enforcement of the mortgagee's contractual right of ownership and possession does not modify the remedy merely; it destroys, for the period of delay, all remedy so far as the enforcement of that right is concerned. The phrase, "obligation of a contract", in the constitutional sense imports a legal duty to perform the specified obligation of that contract, not to substitute and perform, against the will of one of the parties, a different, albeit equally valuable, obligation. And a State, under the contract impairment clause, has no more power to accomplish such a substitution than has one of the parties to the contract against the will of the other. It cannot do so either by acting directly upon the contract, or by bringing about the result under the guise of a statute in form acting only upon the remedy. If it could, the efficacy of the constitutional restriction would, in large measure, be made to disappear. As this Court has well said, whatever tends to postpone or retard the enforcement of a contract, to that extent weakens the obligation. According to one Latin proverb, "He who gives quickly, gives twice", and according to another, "He who pays too late, pays less." "Any authorization of the postponement of payment, or of means by which such postponement may be effected, is in conflict with the constitutional inhibition" (Louisiana v. New Orleans, 102 U.S. 203, 207). I am not able to see any real distinction between a statute which in substantive terms alters the obligation of a debtor-creditor contract so as to extend the time of its performance for a period of 2 years and a statute which, though in terms acting upon the remedy, is aimed at the obligation (as distinguished, for example, from the judicial procedure incident to the enforcement thereof) and which does in fact withhold from the creditor, for the same period of time, the stipulated fruits of his contract.

I quite agree with the opinion of the Court that whether the legislation under review is wise or unwise is a matter with which we have nothing to do. Whether it is likely to work well or work ill presents a question entirely irrelevant to the issue. The only legitimate inquiry we can make is whether it is constitutional. If it is not, its virtues, if it have any, cannot save it; if it is, its faults cannot be invoked to accomplish its destruction. If the provisions of the Constitution be not upheld when they pinch as well as when they comfort, they may as well be abandoned. Being unable to reach any other conclusion than that the Minnesota statute infringes the constitutional restrictions under review, I have no choice but to say so.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Van Devanter, Mr. Justice McReynolds, and Mr. Justice Butler concur in this opinion.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission granted to include in my remarks certain material relative to the United States Supreme Court decision of January 8, 1934, upholding the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law, I now present a report of newspaper and magazine statements, issued shortly after this historic decision was handed down. From coast to coast the significance of the decision was noted.

The New York Times contains a telegram of Matthew Napear, chairman of the Consolidated Home Owners' Mortgage Committee, to Hon. Herbert H. Lehman, Governor of the State of New York. Note the statement that the distinguished former Member of this body, the Honorable Fiorello H. LaGuardia, on behalf of the farm and home owners, advocated a bill like the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law for the State of New York. Friends of the home owners and farm owners will be interested in securing copies of the proposed New York moratorium law from the Consolidated Home Owners' Mortgage Committee, room 1712, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

FORECLOSURE STAY ASKED OF LEHMAN—HOME OWNERS' BODY ADVOCATES LAW LIKE MINNESOTA'S, JUST UPHELD BY HIGH COURT—"GENUINE RELIEF"—MORATORIUM ENACTED HERE LAST SUMMER IS SAID TO HAVE ONLY AGGRAVATED SITUATION

Governor Lehman was asked yesterday by the Consolidated Home Owners' Mortgage Committee to recommend enactment of legislation protecting home owners against foreclosures.

In a telegram the group urged relief legislation along the lines of the Minnesota statute, the constitutionality of which was upheld last Tuesday by the United States Supreme Court. The plea was signed by Matthew Napear, New York State chairman of the Consolidated Home Owners' Mortgage Committee, who led the march of home owners to Albany last August. He said the bill submitted by his committee with the collaboration of Mayor LaGuardia at the special session of the legislature last summer had in it practically the same provisions as the Minnesota law, and that the recommendations of Governor Lehman's advisory committee on home and farm mortgages also followed that law.

The Minnesota law gives discretionary power to the courts to suspend foreclosure sales, provides for an upset price on fair valuation, and permits owners of foreclosed homes and farmsteads to redeem their property in 2 years.

The telegram to the Governor said:

"Consolidated Home Owners' Mortgage Committee, New York State Division, calls upon you to follow lead of highest court and recommend to the legislature genuine relief for more than million owners of small homes and farmsteads menaced by rising tide of foreclosures. Foreclosure moratorium passed by legislature has served to aggravate situation by seeming to provide legislative justification for foreclosures where owners are unable to meet interest or taxes. The case for adequate relief was eloquently stated by advisory committee on home and farm mortgages, headed by Lucian R. Eastman. Without protection of home owner and farmer from foreclosure menace, recovery cannot go forward."

MORTGAGE MORATORIUM UPHELD IN UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT BY 5 TO 4—HUGHES JOINS LIBERALS IN VIEW THAT MINNESOTA LAW EXTENDING RELIEF TO MORTGAGOR IS VALID—INDICATES N.R.A. WILL BE SUSTAINED—COURT, HOWEVER, MAKES IT CLEAR THAT EACH ISSUE IN RECOVERY PROGRAM WILL BE JUDGED ON MERITS

WASHINGTON, January 8.—The Supreme Court of the United States, acting on the first of the new-deal cases brought before it, divided 5 to 4 today in favor of emergency relief legislation, but made it clear that each issue in the program would be decided on its merits.

Although the decision had to do directly with the constitutionality of the Minnesota moratorium law, it was recognized as having broad ramifications and as certain to go down in history as one of the most momentous rulings of the Court in recent years.

LAW GIVES MORTGAGE RELIEF

The State law under question extends the time for redemption of mortgaged property sold under foreclosure and contains other provisions intended to relieve persons hard pressed by mortgages. In ruling that the Minnesota law did not violate the contract rights of mortgage holders under the Federal Constitution, the majority of the Court indicated that it was not concerned with the question whether the legislation was good or bad but only with the right of a State to suspend provisions of contracts in emergencies.

Holding that a State possesses authority "to safeguard the vital interests of its people", the decision pointed out that "emergency does not create power" under the Constitution, but "may furnish the occasion for the exercise of power."

Great political significance was attached to the fact that Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes joined the so-called "liberal" group of the Court and handed down the majority decision, which was concurred in by Associate Justices Brandeis, Roberts, Cardozo, and Stone.

This majority for liberal policies recalled the report in recent months that President Roosevelt had entertained the thought of enlarging the Court to shift the balance of power from conservative to liberal, if necessary, to insure approval of his recovery program. With Chief Justice Hughes lining up with the Court liberals and providing a majority in favor of the Minnesota law, the decision was interpreted as giving the President reason to believe he would have the Supreme Court backing he has openly requested without the necessity of reconstituting the Court.

SUTHERLAND READS DISSENT

The dissenting opinion was read by Associate Justice George Sutherland, who was joined by Associate Justices McReynolds, Butler, and Van Devanter. Both opinions were lengthy, and it required about 2 hours of the time of the Court to hear them read.

Despite the majority's observation that "emergency does not create power", its decision was widely heralded as meaning the eventual sustaining by the Court of the N.R.A. and other recovery efforts of the administration. Senate and House lawyers hastened to study the decision. The fact that Chief Justice Hughes was alined with the "liberals" caused much comment.

In effect, the Minnesota law is based on the right of a State to suspend provisions of contracts in an emergency such as the present economic one. The case was that of Home Building & Loan Association, appellant, against John H. Blaisdel, and Rosella Blaisdell, his wife. The Supreme Court of Minnesota upheld the law and the appeal to the highest Court was from that tribunal.

COURT FINDS EMERGENCY JUSTIFIED LAW

The appellant attacked the validity of the Minnesota law as being repugnant to the contract clause and the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

An important aspect of the majority opinion was that it recognized that "an emergency existed in Minnesota which furnished a proper occasion for the exercise of the reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community." It found there "were in Minnesota conditions urgently demanding relief if power existed to give it." This emergency threatened the loss of homes and farms. The majority of the Court made it plain that such conditions called for the exercise of all the valid reserve power of the State to reach them if possible. As is well known the Federal recovery legislation is built on the proposition that a national emergency akin to war is existent.

The Court ruled that the contract clause of the Constitution was not "an absolute and utterly unqualified restriction of the State's protective power" over its citizens.

MINORITY HELD CONTRACT IMPAIRED

Justice Sutherland, in the dissenting opinion, held that the Minnesota law impaired the obligation of contracts. He asserted that the "obligation of a contract" in the constitutional sense implied a legal duty to perform the specified obligations of that contract, not to substitute and perform, against the will of one of the parties, a different, even though equally valuable, obligation.

"And a State," Justice Sutherland added, "under the contract-impairment clause, has no more power to accomplish such a substitution than has one of the parties to the contract against the will of the other."

Viewing the majority opinion as of great significance, Justice Sutherland said that "few questions of greater moment than that just decided have been submitted for judicial inquiry during this generation." He regarded the Minnesota law as a dangerous inroad on the limitations of the Federal Constitution.

MORATORIUM LAW RULING DISCUSSED—DEMOCRATS AND PROGRESSIVES DECLARE IT FORESHADOWS UPHOLDING OF N.R.A.—CALLED TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT

WASHINGTON, January 9.—The Supreme Court's decision yesterday upholding the Minnesota moratorium law, and thus giving evident support to emergency powers incident to the new-deal program, was widely discussed today, both among exponents of the program and its opponents.

Democrats and insurgent Republicans hailed with high satisfaction the majority opinion, in which Chief Justice Hughes joined the four liberals of the Court—Brandeis, Stone, Roberts, and Cardozo.

Administration critics generally refrained from comment, but one who did not care to be quoted said there was a great deal of difference between affirming emergency powers of a State and asserting the right of Congress to pass emergency laws that would affect the whole Nation.

Speaker RAINEY declared the decision indicated that the Supreme Court would "sustain every code thus far enacted or hereafter enacted to get the country out of the depression."

EXPRESSIONS OF OPINION

Expressions of others on the subject were as follows:

Senator ADAMS, Democrat: "I would say it is the twenty-second amendment to the Constitution. The Court recognizes that public necessity must be the predominant consideration in an emergency. It is not the first time the Constitution has been amended by the Court. I am in favor of the decision, but I recognize that it involves a stretch of the Constitution. The Supreme Court, it has long been recognized, is not only judicial but legislative."

Senator NORRIS, Progressive Republican: "I am glad of it. It will convince everybody, including the Supreme Court, that we are trying to save this country. It will tend to back up those who are seeking to reinforce the recovery legislation by amendment."

Senator BYRNES, Democrat: "I have said that the glory of this country is that at all periods in time of crisis the courts as well as other branches of this Government have, as a rule, responded to the overwhelming will of the people. The decision is a recognition of the fact that the Constitution is an instrument that must change with the changing conditions of our existence."

"EXCELLENT", SAYS JOHNSON

Senator JOHNSON, Progressive Republican: "It is a far-reaching opinion that will have a tremendous effect upon the recovery program. I regard it as a most excellent decision."

Senator BANKHEAD, Democrat: "I think it is sound. It's in line really with former precedents. The Supreme Court heretofore has sustained emergency legislation. We have been acting on that doctrine all the time. The decision in the Minnesota case foreshadows that the recovery legislation will be held constitutional."

MINNESOTA RULING TO AID NEW N.R.A. BILLS IN CONGRESS—ALSO EXPECTED TO BOLSTER RECOVERY MOVES IN LOWER COURT SUITS—TO CURB FOES OF ACT—HIGHEST LEGAL TRIBUNAL BEHIND THE NEW DEAL, SENATOR WAGNER DECLARES

By Robert S. Allen, Staff Correspondent of Evening Post

WASHINGTON, January 10.—The United States Supreme Court has joined the ranks of the new deal.

That was the general authoritative consensus here following the Tribunal's 5-to-4 decision upholding the constitutionality of Minnesota's Emergency Mortgage Moratorium Act.

Administration and progressive quarters were gratified by the victory, narrow though it was. Republicans and conservative Democrats generally maintained glum silence.

HISTORIC SIGNIFICANCE

Privately, some of the former tried to minimize the importance of the Court's action.

They pointed out that the majority decision specifically declared that, while approval was given the act under consideration, it was not to be taken as a carte blanche endorsement of all emergency legislation.

But both critics and endorsers were unanimous in the view that the Court's ruling was of far-reaching and historic significance.

RESTRAINT ON FOES

In administration circles satisfaction was predicated on three factors:

(1) The powerful effect the Supreme Court's verdict will have on lower courts.

(2) The restraining influence it is certain to wield on certain business and financial interests who either covertly or openly are resisting or conspiring against the various recovery acts.

(3) The impetus the decision will give to promote enactment of additional emergency legislation that the administration will seek at this session of Congress.

OTHER VICTORIES WON

The administration's recovery measures have already won several minor skirmishes in the lower courts.

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia recently dismissed a case brought against the N.R.A. A New York Federal bench has also upheld the gold-surrender order.

The ruling in itself has no direct bearing on such pending controversies as the refusal of the Weirton Steel Co. and the E. G. Budd Manufacturing Co. to abide by the orders of the National Labor Board.

DOOMED TO DEFEAT

But, indirectly, it does serve notice to these employers that a majority of the highest legal tribunal in the land is behind the new-deal program, and that if they intend forcing their resistance to an issue they are doomed to defeat.

That point was particularly stressed by Senator WAGNER, Chairman of the National Labor Board and coauthor of the Industrial Recovery Act, and Senator GEORGE NORRIS, progressive leader.

"It is highly gratifying to see the Supreme Court's complete appreciation of the great economic and social problems that confronted Minnesota", WAGNER said. "I think that, likewise, the Court will appreciate the problems that confront Congress and the President in the same light.

"There can be no doubt of the constitutionality of the National Recovery Act, for it is also based on an emergency condition. However, I am of the firm opinion that the act would be approved regardless of the national emergency."

"I am glad of the decision", Senator NORRIS asserted, "because it will convince everybody, including the Supreme Court, that we are trying to save the country."

There is no question that the decision dealt dissenting Republicans a paralyzing blow. That is particularly true of the small coterie of ultrapartisan tories, such as Senator ROBINSON of Indiana, Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, Senator "Hell-Roaring Dick" DICKINSON, of Iowa, and Pennsylvania's Senator, DAVID REED.

It was ironic that at the very time that Chief Justice Hughes was reading the majority's momentous decision upholding a crucial emergency act the Republican professional "viewers-with-alarm" were holding forth loudly in the Senate less than 100 yards away denouncing such legislation.

The significance of that picture was not lost on administration and progressive strategists.

COURT DECISION BLOW TO FOES OF ROOSEVELT—UPHOLDING OF MORATORIUM CRUSHES REVOLT AGAINST RECOVERY PROGRAM—RULING AT CRUCIAL MOMENT—REPUBLICANS AND EVEN DEMOCRATS HAD BEEN DRAWING LINES FOR WAR IN CONGRESS

By Phelps Adams

The threat of an immediate congressional revolt against the President's recovery program was crushed emphatically here today as the Members of both Houses began to grasp the full significance of the United States Supreme Court's upholding the constitutionality of the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law and reaffirming the doctrine of John Marshall that the Constitution is designed for adaptation to changing conditions—a decision which accorded both stability and legal respectability to the new deal for the first time.

At almost every step of its progress through the legislative machine, the constitutionality of the President's plan has been challenged; and while that plan will continue to face numerous attacks on other grounds, the greatest danger that confronted it has been safely passed in the opinion of observers here.

The decision of the Court came at the precise moment when the Republican minority was undertaking to launch a concerted attack against the recovery program and when disgruntled elements within the Democratic ranks were coalescing into opposition groups.

Every agency of the emergency administrations which have been superimposed upon the normal governmental structure was threatened with investigation designed to unearth some possible scandal that might help to turn the tide of public sentiment definitely against the huge spending program that is contemplated.

ONLY FLURRIES EXPECTED

The investigations will presumably go on, but, with the Supreme Court apparently alined with the President behind the new economic experiment, any disclosures which may result will not give rise, it is believed, to more than a passing flurry of excitement.

TODAY AND TOMORROW

By Walter Lippmann

THE VOICE OF THE SUPREME COURT

From the opinion of the Supreme Court on the Minnesota moratorium it is possible to obtain a fairly clear idea of the principle by which the Court is likely to judge the great mass of new legislation recently enacted. The case before the judges turned on whether a statute of Minnesota to relieve mortgagors was contrary to the provisions in the Federal Constitution against the impairment of contracts.

The details of the statute, of the particular case, and of the argument from precedent we may leave to the lawyers. Our concern is with the general principles which were invoked by Chief Justice Hughes in the majority opinion holding the Minnesota statute constitutional. For presumably his statement of principles in this case discloses what will be the mind of the majority in considering the body of the new legislation.

* * * * * * *

The basic principle is that the power exists in American Government to protect "the vital interests of the people." "We must never forget", says the Chief Justice, quoting Marshall, "that it is a Constitution we are expounding * * * a Constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs." The Legislature and the Supreme Court of Minnesota had declared that an emergency existed which threatened many of the people with "the loss of homes and lands which furnish those in possession the necessary shelter and means of subsistence." The Chief Justice finds that the Minnesota estimate of the facts of the situation "cannot be regarded as a subterfuge or as lacking in adequate basis" and that it is "beyond cavil" that there were conditions in Minnesota "urgently demanding relief." In other words, this law to postpone the redemption of mortgages and prevent foreclosure was honest. It responded to a true estimate of the facts. It was not a sly device for enabling debtors to cheat their creditors.

Thus it transpires that the Court holds that extraordinary legislation may be justified provided it is clear that it deals with a real public need. Apparently the Court will insist upon being convinced that the extraordinary laws are what they profess to be—measures to protect the public interest under extraordinary circumstances. A layman reading this opinion must, I think, conclude that the Court will insist upon evidence that the new laws do not mask ulterior purposes; that under the guise of protecting "the vital interests of the people" in an emergency they are not permanent alterations in established obligations and in the established limitations of government power. The Court does not say that a legislature may do what it likes on the plea that there is an emergency. It says that a legislature may do what is necessary, but what it does must be done sincerely, candidly, and with plain and specific relation to the actual situation.

* * * * * * *

In recognizing that power exists to deal with the emergency the Court, furthermore, lays down the rule that extraordinary legislation must be "temporary in operation * * * (and) limited to the exigency which called it forth." A legislature, for example, may relieve debtors in a crisis by giving them a moratorium, but it cannot cancel their debts for all time to come. This statute runs until May 1, 1935. "The operation of the statute", says the Court, "could not validly outlast the emergency or be so extended as virtually to destroy the contracts."

This appears to be quite in line with other decisions in recent years which draw a rather sharp line between temporary and permanent legislation. Toward temporary laws to meet a crisis the Court is very liberal—it recognizes that the power exists to do any reasonable thing to meet a crisis, be it war, or earthquake and flood and fire, or an economic convulsion. But laws which are to be permanent it quite evidently intends to scrutinize carefully and to judge by much stricter standards of constitutional powers and rights.

Although the Minnesota decision is by a narrow majority of 5 to 4, few reasonable people have ever doubted that the Court would uphold emergency legislation that was patently sincere. It would be a strange constitution which prevented a legislature from using its best judgment to protect its people during a great calamity, which bound it so that in the theoretical interest of the creditor, it could not act to prevent a disaster which would overwhelm creditor and debtor alike. But at the same time this decision by the so-called "liberals" of the Court makes it perfectly clear that permanent changes in American institutions cannot be wrought by subterfuges, by exploiting the emergency for ends which, however good in themselves, are not part of the emergency.

This is the genuine liberal doctrine. It contemplates a government of powers adapted, as Marshall said, to the various crises of human affairs. But it contemplates also a government in which permanent changes in institutions must be made only by the considered action of the people, by the people and their representatives when the issues are squarely presented, when they have had the opportunity to know what they are doing, when they are not confused by the pressure of an immediate crisis and are under no compulsion to assent to what they do not really believe in because they are frightened by a great but temporary danger.

A constitution which is flexible enough to enable governments to deal with a crisis and yet strong enough to withstand temptation to scrap essential parts of it in moments of excitement is likely to weather many storms. The Constitution which the Chief Justice has once more expounded is the Constitution which the great mass of the people have believed in.

HUMAN RIGHTS WIN OVER PROPERTY RIGHTS

Nine men sit on the Supreme Court bench at Washington.

Before the eyes of observers they break into two groups. Five go to one side, and their leader makes a long, grave statement.

The remaining four sit and stare doubtfully. One utters a protest.

It is done.

The American revolution of the last 2 years reaches the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the highest court of the land it is decided that human rights take precedent over contract rights.

A new day of freedom for America.

The Minnesota mortgage decision is probably the most important since the Dred Scott case.

It is decided that when contract rights, hitherto sacrosanct, come into conflict with the common good in a time of economic emergency, the contract rights can be modified by Government.

Minnesota adopted a law last year giving home owners 2 years extra in which to redeem property foreclosed for nonpayment of mortgage. A home owner, whose actual mortgage contract allowed only 1 year for redemption, availed himself of the law.

The mortgagee sued on the ground that the law impaired the obligation of contracts and was thus a violation of constitutional guaranty.

The Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Hughes, declared "the question is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends."

Contract rights, hitherto used as a device for slaughtering all forms of progressive social legislation, are suddenly pushed to the back.

The Nation, and the States, have a right to work for the common welfare in a time of economic stress.

Mr. Hughes' basic argument is that back of all contracts lies the reserved power of the State to make laws which, by strengthening the State, and improving the general condition in a time of stress, strengthens all contracts, regardless of the effect on any particular contract.

The decision does not destroy contract rights. It recognizes contract rights, by holding that the action of Minnesota gave adequate protection to the contracting parties, and made their position stronger.

The question as to what constitutes an emergency remains unsettled.

But it is enough that general economic distress is recognized as an emergency equal to flood or war or fire. It is enough that human hunger and need receive legal recognition.

It is enough that a decision has been rendered which must, if logically extended, put the whole mass of new deal legislation, from N.R.A. down, on a sound basis.

The Supreme Court has bound itself, and the lower courts as well, to consider every particle of new deal legislation in the light of the depression. It has bound itself to weigh the terms of every bond against the factors of hunger and need.

The sentence rings clear: "The economic interests of the State may justify the exercise of its continuing and dominant protective power, notwithstanding interference with contracts * * *."

We are free of a great danger. Legalism will not tie our hands as we move forward to a better America. The Constitution is protecting the country, not tying it hand and foot.

[From the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Jan. 10, 1934]

THE SUPREME COURT SPEAKS

Those who anticipate approval of the emergency national recovery measures by the court of last resort have reason to be heartened by the 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law, though technically the ruling bears only on State rights—the freedom of a State government to meet an emergency without legalistic hampering.

"No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts", is the specific language of the United States Constitution, article I, section 10. This was first judicially annulled by the sustaining of the New York emergency rent law. So the later decision does not make a precedent; it follows a precedent.

A court is no wiser or unwiser than the judges who compose it. Here we have Justices Brandeis, Cardoza, Stone, and Roberts on one side of a great question as liberals, and we have Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, Butler, and Sutherland as conservatives, on the other side of the same question, and Chief Justice Hughes as the balance of power, swinging victory to the side of the liberals. Truly, the law is not an exact science. On the same line-up we should have one man, Charles Evans Hughes, making valid or invalid the cognate emergency powers exercised by the Roosevelt administration under existing legislation.

The question what constitutes an emergency seems to be one for final decision not by the State but by the Supreme Court under the reasoning of Chief Justice Hughes, who writes the opinion of the majority. Yet the initial determination of this question must be made by the State, and long and costly litigation may be necessary to upset it, even if the emergency is fictitious. We have 48 States. Most of them are borrowing States, with legislatures strongly inclined to aid borrowers. Heretofore it has been safe to lend to persons within the jurisdiction of these States, because whatever happened a contract could not be impaired. Will it still be safe? Only time can give the answer.

The theory of the four dissenting Justices, voiced by the Sutherland opinion, is that the language of the Constitution cannot be made flexible, and Justice Sutherland quotes the expression of the court in the Civil War Milligan case: "No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of the Constitution's provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government."

As between the two views, we think the intelligent opinion of nonlegalistic Americans is as sharply divided as is the Supreme Court. Certainly many thinkers will hold that if the terms of the organic law are to be modified or reversed a convention, and not Justice Hughes, should produce the change. Yet the effect of this notable decision is to uphold a State in its effort to mitigate the consequences of a great depression which has created new precedents in all governments.

[From the New York Sun, Jan. 9, 1934]

IMPAIRED CONTRACTS

By a vote of 5 to 4 the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the constitutional declaration that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligations of contracts is subject to reasonable modification by State legislatures. In the words of Chief Justice Hughes, "the economic interests of the State may justify the exercise of its continuing and dominant protective power, notwithstanding interference with contracts." The Chief Justice reached back into McCulloch against Maryland to quote John Marshall's observation that the Constitution should be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. As the last two generations can witness, the Constitution can be "adapted" by amendment in the manner provided by the framers.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 10, 1934]

EMERGENCY LAWS

Sometimes an insignificant litigant with a trifling case brings about a judicial decision of the most far-reaching importance. As Hooker said of the law, its care extends to the least as well as the greatest. John and Rosala Blaisdell, his wife, of Minnesota, could not pay the interest on a mortgage which they had given. It was foreclosed. But an appeal was taken under a State law granting a 2-year extension of time on mortgages of that kind. Upheld by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, this statute was challenged in the Supreme Court of the United States, mainly on the ground that it was in violation of the Federal Constitution, which forbids any State to impair the obligations of a contract. By the opinion of a divided court, 5 to 4, it was held that the emergency caused by the depression justified the Minnesota legislation. Thus that particular case is settled, and in the principles laid down in the prevailing opinion, written by Chief Justice Hughes, it is believed that a clear indication is given what the attitude of the Supreme Court will be when various acts of Congress under the recovery program come up for adjudication. It is not forgotten that the decision of the Court of Appeals of New York upholding the act of the legislature which virtually fixed prices for milk was based distinctly on the emergency doctrine. From that decision an appeal was allowed to the Supreme Court at Washington.

In such sharp divisions of constitutional interpretation as appear in the decision read by Chief Justice Hughes, and the dissent written by Mr. Justice Sutherland, it is hard for the layman to grasp all the fine distinctions that are made. Both judges agree that an emergency creates no new power of government. It does, however, warrant an extension of existing powers. The sole question is how their exercise is to be reconciled with constitutional limitations. Judge Sutherland is for the strictest interpretation. If the Constitution declares that a State must not do a certain thing, we must not allow the thing to be done even if it would greatly minister to the public comfort. Chief Justice Hughes, on the other hand, joined as he was by the four so-called "liberals" of the Court, thinks of the Constitution as a living and flexible organism, able to adapt itself to the changing needs of successive generations. If a destructive hurricane warrants a temporary stretching of governmental power, so may an economic crisis. Emphasis is laid on the fact that such legislation as that in Minnesota had a proper occasion, was directed toward a legitimate end, laid down conditions which do not appear to be unreasonable, and was temporary in operation. It is limited to the exigency which called it forth.

Lawyers will still ask upon what evidence judges depend in order to establish the existence of an emergency. They will continue to inquire, and we doubt very much if they will get an answer, what provision or fair implication of the Constitution permits a judicial declaration in favor of emergency powers. For most laymen, as doubtless for John and Rosala, of Minnesota, it will seem sufficient that the Supreme Court has spoken. For the present, at any rate, the country will be disposed to say: "Roma dixit causa finita est."

[From the New York World Telegram, Jan. 10, 1934]

THE NEW DEAL STANDS

The Supreme Court will not destroy the new deal. That is the general interpretation of the Court's decision upholding as constitutional the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law. Perhaps that interpretation is premature in view of the closeness of the 5-to-4 decision.

Nevertheless no one will deny the vast importance of this first test case and of the issue raised. This was stressed even by the Court minority. In the minority dissent Mr. Justice Sutherland said:

"Few questions of greater moment than that just decided have been submitted for judicial inquiry during this generation."

The specific issue was the relation of the State law to the contract clause of the United States Constitution. The larger question was the supremacy of the general social interest in an emergency over contractual property rights.

The Court majority sustained the State law on the ground that the purpose of the latter was the protection of a basic interest of society. To the layman and to administration lawyers it appears that this same reason is sufficient legal justification and proof of the constitutionality of the Federal laws enacted to save the Nation in an emergency.

Citizens and experts may disagree over the assumed powers—or, as many believe, the usurped powers—of the Supreme Court to make and unmake laws through the method of reviewing constitutionality. But it is fairly well agreed that the court can wreck either itself or the Constitution or both in exercising such legislative powers, unless it interprets the dead letter of the Constitution in the light of living facts.

A growing nation meeting ever new problems and emergencies simply cannot be confined in a legalistic strait-jacket. If the Constitution is a prison, our Nation must escape it or die. And, of course, the chief reason our ancient Constitution has not been overthrown long ago is precisely because the Court—however belatedly—has interpreted it to fit existing necessity.

Chief Justice Marshall, the great conservative who was largely responsible, by usurpation or otherwise, for making the Court all-powerful over the people and their elected government, was wise enough to foresee this.

In our judgment, the most significant part of Chief Justice Hughes' majority decision in the Minnesota mortgage moratorium case is that which states with such clarity that the Constitution is not confined to the views of its dead authors.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 10, 1934]

HOME-LOAN BURDEN HELD LIGHTENED BY HIGH COURT RULING—APPROVAL OF MORATORIUM ACT VIEWED AS EASING TASK OF FEDERAL GROUP

WASHINGTON, January 9.—The belief that the Supreme Court's validation of Minnesota's mortgage moratorium law might lighten the Federal task of refinancing farm and home indebtedness was expressed today by Farm Credit Administration and Home Owners' Loan Corporation officials.

The Court's decision upheld State legislation extending the time for redemption of property foreclosed for nonpayment of mortgage indebtedness and containing other provisions to ease the debtor's burden.

Officials said today almost 20 States had enacted legislation which followed similar lines and that many legislatures meeting this year probably would pass such laws now that the Minnesota statute had been declared constitutional. Some laws already passed have been held unconstitutional by State courts.

BENEFIT SEEN

One of the principal benefits to the work of the Home Loan and Farm Credit Administrations, officials said, was that an extension of the time for redemption would allow in many instances a sufficient period for a Federal loan on the property or a scaling down of the indebtedness if its present value is insufficient to cover the amount due.

Difficulty that the two organizations have had in getting their bonds accepted by creditors is expected to be dissipated if Congress guarantees the principal as well as the interest on the securities. President Roosevelt is to send a request for such legislation to Congress tomorrow.

Meanwhile, both Democrats and Republicans, whether liberal or conservative, were studying the broad principles laid down by the Court in holding the Minnesota statute constitutional.

RAINEY PRAISES RULING

Speaker RAINEY praised the decision and Chairman JONES, of the House Agricultural Committee, said it was far-reaching and would prevent mortgage holders from taking advantage of an emergency to deprive people of their homes.

Administration supporters, generally, took the attitude that the Minnesota case forecast decisions upholding the National Industrial Recovery Act, the farm adjustment measure, and other emergency legislation backed by the President.

The four dissenting judges, in an opinion by Justice Sutherland, took the view the Minnesota law impaired the sanctity of contracts.

The majority, through Chief Justice Hughes, found that there was a situation in Minnesota which demanded relief if the State had power to give it, and that the State possessed such authority even if it meant that mortgage holders were denied for a time the foreclosure rights laid down in the contracts made with their debtors.

The Chief Justice said the Minnesota statute should be sustained as a law for the protection of a basic interest of society.

CHANGED ATTITUDE SEEN

Only 3 years ago the Chief Justice was assailed in the Senate as a man who thought more of the rights of property than he did the rights of the individual.

The occasion was his nomination to succeed the late William Howard Taft as Chief Justice. Hughes was confirmed after Senate progressives spent several days in lambasting him.

He surprised them and the conservatives, too, at the fall term of court by siding with the liberal element to uphold Indiana's chain-store tax.

He left the conservatives also in the California syndicalism case, the Minnesota newspaper gag law, and a series of others, although he has sided with the conservatives now and then, particularly with regard to tax legislation.

CONGRESS WINS ADDED POWERS UNDER VERDICT—SUPREME COURT DECISION GIVES SWEEPING AUTHORITY TO ACT WHEN FACING AN EMERGENCY

Armed with a decision of the Supreme Court that laws may be enforced when made in behalf of all the people in times of emergency, the Roosevelt recovery program is on sure ground. This decision was handed down Monday on the matter of a mortgage moratorium law passed in Minnesota. Following is the second of two articles dealing with the significance of the decision:

You may view with alarm the decision of the Supreme Court that a law in behalf of the general welfare may outweigh even the wording of a clause of the Constitution as to your own welfare.

And justifiably so, for, henceforth, the responsibility of determining the general welfare lies not within the Constitution but within the discretion of Congress.

True, nobody conceives of a law providing that your hams may be seized by the sheriff or your goods confiscated or your contracts interfered with recklessly and no recompense provided. But that's only because we all have faith in the good sense of our lawmakers and the belief that they will not go that far.

For by its decision of Monday the Supreme Court has restated an opinion of Chief Justice Marshall of more than a hundred years ago, that Congress may act for the general good, and has added to his opinion the significant remark that the declaration by Congress of an emergency liberates that body to act to the best interests of all even at the loss of one or any part of the whole of the citizenry.

The rigid words of the Constitution, the Court now holds, cannot be interpreted to interfere with what the State conceives to be its protective power over its citizens.

And there's the rub.

BEYOND THE POWER OF COURT

For now the action of the State as a protective power in the emergency akin to war, lies beyond the power of the Supreme Court. A law may be passed that is, in the opinion of the Court, unwise or even unfair. But if it is proclaimed on a basis of recognition of national emergency and a threat to the welfare of the whole people it sticks.

Congress is bound only by its own discretion on matters relating to the emergency and its bearing on general welfare.

And nowhere in the Constitution can you find words to support that.

And that is what plagues many a sincere believer that his rights have been lost and his constitutional guaranties removed by Monday's decision. Among these is Justice Sutherland, of the Supreme Court, who wrote a dissenting opinion, to which three other justices adhered.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 10, 1934]

THE SUPREME COURT DECISION

The average citizen, confronted with the wealth of logic and precedent found in both opinions on the Minnesota mortgage moratorium case, will probably form his own judgment by asking a simple question: What would have happened had the Supreme Court decided 5 to 4 against the constitutionality of this law?

The answer to that question is likely to be disconcerting to all, and they must be numerous, who feel that the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Sutherland carries more pure legal conviction than the majority opinion as expressed by Chief Justice Hughes. An adverse opinion on this Minnesota case would have had repercussions far beyond the confines of that State and far deeper in character than the particular law in issue. The legality of large parts of the recovery program, based upon the sweeping emergency powers conferred by Congress on the President, would have been immediately called into question. As the situation rests, that program is now strongly fortified to meet its next test of constitutionality.

In other words, the general reaction to this historic decision is likely to be that it was foreordained by circumstances. This feeling will be strengthened by the significant emphasis of the majority opinion upon the temporary and conditional character of the legislation which has been sustained. It is not stated that the Minnesota moratorium law would have been found unconstitutional if its application were more permanent and less reasonable, but that is the implication. To a pronounced extent it is not the constitutionality so much as the rationality of the legislation which is defended by the majority opinion. Because of this there is a suggestion of inconsistency in the conclusion that the Court was not concerned with the wisdom or unwisdom, as a matter of policy, of the legislation at issue. The concurrence of the minority opinion with this conclusion is more convincing than its assertion by the majority.

The decision may well both augment and diminish the prestige of that august body which has been America's most notable contribution of the mechanism of constitutional government. Those with legal training will be apt to feel that the Supreme Court has swung its emphasis to the opportunist side in a case where the issue of constitutionality was nicely balanced. Those who form simpler judgments will probably conclude that the Court is a very human body which took the most practical way out of a very thorny situation. There will be many comments on another 5-to-4 decision. And those comments will hit fairly near the heart of the difficulty.

There will, of course, be no lessening of the high respect in which the justices of the Supreme Court are held both individually and collectively. Even the most cursory reading of both the majority and minority opinions in the Minnesota case reveals the earnestness, the integrity, and the scholarship behind both of these opposing viewpoints. But the situation serves to emphasize that these viewpoints are literally opinions—not oracular judgments.

At a time when the standing of all institutions is challenged by the flux of circumstance, that of the Supreme Court becomes more anomalous just because it is apt to be regarded as infallible. But when a rigid Constitution comes into direct opposition with an inflexible economic situation, it is not difficult to predict which of the two will yield. The merit of the legal mind lies in its ability to find precedents to show that it is constitutional for rigidity to become temporarily malleable.

[From the Washington Evening Star, Jan. 10, 1934]

A FAR-REACHING DECISION

The Supreme Court of the United States has handed down an opinion of great signficance and far-reaching effect in the case relating to the Minnesota law establishing a moratorium on foreclosures of mortgages. Involved in the case, which challenged the constitutionality of the State law in the light of the prohibition in the Constitution against impairment of contracts, was the question of the protection of a basic interest of society, a protection made necessary by the economic situation arising in the country. The court, in a decision handed down by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes and concurred in by four other members of the Court, upheld the validity of the Minnesota law.

The decision of the Court in this case, involving a State law growing out of the economic emergency, may be a forerunner of others. Indeed, it has been hailed as the first victory in the legal battle which has been gathering over the validity and constitutionality of many of the recovery acts of the administration. The Minnesota law was upheld, it is true, by a narrow margin. The Court divided 5 to 4. Its decision, however, is none the less binding. The recovery laws passed by the Congress at the behest of the administration have been challenged in various quarters on the ground of unconstitutionality. It is quite true that the Minnesota law is a State enactment, like the New York State milk law, the validity of which the Supreme Court is expected to pass upon also at an early date. But these State laws, like the New York rent laws enacted some years ago, which were upheld by the Supreme Court, are based upon the existence of an emergency and are temporary in character.

The seriousness of the conflict between those who hold that an emergency, threatening the public welfare, warrants the exercise of power by Government and the State, and those who would hew to the narrow line constitutional interpretation, is recognized.

It is particularly recognized in the dissenting opinion of the Court, written by Associate Justice Sutherland and concurred in by three of his colleagues. The view of these dissenters from the opinion of the majority of the Court is succinctly expressed in the declaration that "if the provisions of the Constitution be not upheld when they pinch as well as when they comfort, they may as well be abandoned."

The prohibition against the impairment of contracts in the Constitution is contained in section 10 of article 1, which says: "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility."

The Court held that an emergency existed in Minnesota which furnished a proper occasion for the exercise of the reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community. That reserve power of the State is safeguarded in the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which declares: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The Court further held that the Minnesota law did not contravene the Constitution since it was of a character appropriate to an emergency and was granted upon reasonable conditions. The period of redemption for the mortgages laid down, the Court held, seemed to be not unreasonable, and the legislation which is temporary in character, is limited to the exigency which called it forth.

EMERGENCY IS STRESSED BY SUPREME COURT—WRITER POINTS OUT THAT PERMANENT NEW DEAL MAY NOT BE BACKED

By David Lawrence

WASHINGTON, D.C., January 9.—President Roosevelt's "new deal" may be justified constitutionally as an emergency. But any effort to make it permanent, as advocated by the President in his recent message, will run counter to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This trend of judicial opinion may be inferred from the latest decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in sustaining the Minnesota mortgage law.

Nobody knows, of course, what the Supreme Court will say about any future case, as each stands on its own merits and its own set of facts, but official Washington has been waiting for several months for a hint as to how the Supreme Court justices would divide on some of the major questions of constitutional law involved in the new deal.

While the Minnesota case involves the power of a State rather than any Federal law, the principles underlying the decision are just the same as if the National Industrial Recovery Act had been under consideration.

LAW HAD TIME LIMIT

The Minnesota law provided that the State could prevent foreclosures by requiring the holder of the mortgage to accept a fair rental value or interest charge until a specific date in 1934. Had there been no date fixed, the law would have been regarded as a piece of permanent legislation. This may be assumed from the fact that the majority opinion of the Supreme Court made a special point concerning the limited character of the legislation.

But it is significant that the Supreme Court did say that a State could pass a law which frankly impaired a contract and that this is not a violation of the Federal Constitution, which declares that no State shall make a law impairing the obligations of a contract.

The emergency produced by the bank holiday and the economic depression was described at length by the Supreme Court as justifying the State of Minnesota in postponing foreclosure actions. The minority of the Supreme Court quoted from previous opinions to justify the assertion that economic distress may be severe, but that it happens frequently in the life of the Nation and that contracts are meant to be carried out and not interfered with by State laws.

HUGHES, ROBERTS, LIBERAL

It is interesting to note that the Supreme Court, in dividing 5 to 4, revealed Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Owen Roberts as concurring with the so-called "liberals"—namely, Justices Brandeis, Cardozo, and Stone—while the minority consisted of Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler.

If the Chief Justice or Mr. Roberts should swing to the other side, we may get decisions holding unconstitutional some of the new-deal legislation.

Every single piece of new-deal legislation has in its preamble a declaration by Congress that a national emergency exists, so it may be taken for granted that for the time being the Supreme Court will uphold any statute which is based on the emergency.

The Supreme Court will also reserve the right to inquire into the facts and circumstances to determine whether the emergency is real or whether it is simply an excuse for the enactment of permanent legislation. A declaration by Congress that an emergency exists does not always mean that the courts will agree with the declaration.

RESERVE POWERS OF GOVERNMENTS

Speculation concerning the logical implications of judicial decisions is usually unprofitable. Nevertheless, many persons doubtless regard the United States Supreme Court's findings in the Minnesota mortgage-moratorium case as distinctly relevant to fundamental constitutional issues raised by the new deal recovery program.

Some believe that the decision foreshadows the Court's approval of even the most radical compulsory features of the N.R.A., the A.A.A., and other emergency establishments. Others point to the fact that four of the justices vigorously dissented from the position taken by the majority. Five-to-four decisions in important cases are not satisfactory, and are not deemed conclusive. Any novel point, and material distinction, may cause one or more of the majority group to change their views.

The essence of the majority decision in the Minnesota case is, briefly, that, although the Federal Constitution does not provide for so-called "emergency powers", it does contemplate the exercise, in emergencies, of powers reserved to the government of a State, if such exercise is necessary to the safety and welfare of the community. The Minnesota mortgage-moratorium law is sustained, therefore, on the ground that it constitutes "a limited and temporary interposition with respect to the enforcement of contracts." A flood or an earthquake, says Chief Justice Hughes, certainly would have warranted a statutory moratorium upon mortgages, and a prolonged economic depression may demand similar interference with contract rights.

The majority opinion makes it clear that no specific grant of power to the Government and no express limitation upon power may be set aside or changed by judicial construction. On the other hand, where constitutional grants or limitations of power are set forth in general terms, the courts are authorized to "fill in the details," in the light of facts and conditions, by reasonable interpretation. And the majority of the Court holds it not unreasonable to affirm that a serious economic crisis is comparable to a physical disaster in the sense that it calls for the use of reserved powers—of "continuing and dominant powers."

The inference is clear that Congress and the Executive may not alter the governmental system of the Republic by destroying guaranteed contract or property rights of citizens under the pretext of meeting an emergency, but that, like the States, the Federal Government may exercise, in authentic crises, reserved powers in a limited way and for a limited time. Whether a Government willfully stretches or abuses its reserved powers, or uses them arbitrarily by continuing to apply them after the emergency has ceased to exist are questions for the judiciary to determine.

HIGH COURT UPHOLDS MORTGAGE MORATORIUM—PLACES STATE'S WELFARE ABOVE PRIVATE RIGHTS—EPOCHAL OPINION FORECASTS UNPRECEDENTED LIBERALITY IN RULINGS ON GOVERNMENT EMERGENCY ACTS—UNITED STATES BENCH VOTES 5 TO 4 IN MINNESOTA CASE

By J. R. Wiggins

WASHINGTON, January 8.—In an epochal opinion setting the economic good of the State over the private-contract rights of the individual and forecasting interpretations of unprecedented liberality on the constitutionality of other emergency powers of the Government, the United States Supreme Court upheld the Minnesota moratorium law today.

PETERSON HAILS COURT'S DECISION

WASHINGTON, January 8.—The Supreme Court's decision upholding the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law was interpreted by Attorney General Harry H. Peterson, of Minnesota, as a constitutional vindication of emergency legislation enacted by the States and the Federal Government, including the National Industry Recovery Act.

Peterson hailed the decision as "a victory for the people of Minnesota that will enable many farmers and city dwellers to hold on to their homes until good times return."

"I am greatly pleased with the decision", he said. "I consider it will enable the State of Minnesota, as well as the many other States with similar laws, to accomplish a great deal for the good of their people.

"It will also enable the Federal Government to carry on under its recovery legislation without fear of an adverse decision as to the constitutionality of the N.R.A.

"The majority opinion, as read by Chief Justice Hughes, was not only a sound statement of the legal phases involved, but was statesmanlike in that it interpreted the Constitution as a living document that must be adapted to current conditions.

"I believe the respite afforded homeowners by such emergency legislation will give them a chance to refinance their obligations through the Farm Credit and Home Loan Corporations and, consequently, will save thousands of homes from foreclosure."

Wisconsin, New York, and Pennsylvania are among other States having mortgage relief laws similar to the Minnesota statute.

Henry Epstein, solicitor general of New York, viewed the decision as a vindication of all such legislation, including that of New York and Pennsylvania, which he described as "much more drastic" than the Minnesota law.

TRIUMPH OF HUMAN RIGHTS, OLSON SAYS

The decision of the United States Supreme Court upholding Minnesota's mortgage moratorium law represents a triumph of human rights over property rights, Governor Olson asserted Monday night.

"The decision represents more than a triumph of the police power clause of the Constitution over the due process of law and obligation of contract clauses", he said.

"It really represents a triumph of human rights over property rights. It also indicates that we can change the system under which we live in any manner we desire and keep within the Constitution."

The law was drafted in the office of Attorney General Harry H. Peterson and passed by the regular 1933 session of the State legislature.

DRAWN BY ORFIELD

The original bill was drawn by Assistant Attorney General Mathias N. Orfield in collaboration with Attorney General Peterson. The case testing the law, which was instituted in the Hennepin County District Court, finally made its way to the high Court of the land after District Judge Arthur Selover, of Minneapolis, ruled it unconstitutional and the Minnesota Supreme Court held it was valid. Justice Royal Stone, of the Minnesota Supreme Court, was the only one dissenting.

Instead of filing a brief as friends of the court, the Minnesota attorney general's office appeared as counsel in the case. Attorney General Peterson and William S. Ervin, assistant attorney general, appeared before the United States Supreme Court early in November and argued in behalf of the law.

"Our office is highly gratified over the high Court's verdict", Assistant Attorney General Ervin said when notified of the decision. "We feel this law is beneficial both to the mortgagees and the mortgagors of this State and that the law is a step in the right direction.

"We feel also that it is not a detriment to the mortgagee, but is helpful to both parties. It will help tide things over until conditions return to normalcy. The law is working out very satisfactorily.

SEES N.I.R.A. AFFECTED

"This case further affects some of the principles involved in the National Industrial Recovery Act, and for that reason also we are highly pleased over the ruling. There are a number of States with similar legislation that will be affected."

In stressing the importance and scope of the case, Mr. Ervin pointed out that the United States Law Week, which is one of the leading legal publications of the country, listed the Minnesota moratorium law and the New York milk action as the most important cases on the United States Supreme Court docket this year.

Attorney General Peterson was in Washington Monday to argue the case of Alabama against Minnesota in the matter of prison-made goods, in which 18 other States are affected.

DIFFERENCE IN MINNESOTA AND NORTH DAKOTA LAW CITED

BISMARCK, N.DAK., January 8.—There are vital distinctions between the Minnesota moratorium law upheld by the United States Supreme Court today and the North Dakota moratorium act, according to C. L. Young, Bismarck, chairman of the State bar board.

Young has made a study of the law of the moratorium for a paper presented before a recent meeting of the State bar association.

The North Dakota moratorium law was held unconstitutional by the State supreme court to the extent that it was intended to affect mortgages given prior to approval of the act, but was held constitutional as far as it affects mortgages given after the act took effect.

"The Minnesota court in its decision", Young said, pointed out what it considered a vital distinction between the two statutes.

"The North Dakota act extends the time of redemption unconditionally for a period of 2 years from the date of the approval of the act. The Minnesota act provides that one who desires to avail himself of the extension provided for must pay the reasonable rental value of the property involved during the period of extension to the party holding the sheriff's certificate of sale. The court said that this provision, in its opinion, provides compensation, so that there is no taking of property without due process of law, although there is in fact some impairment of the obligation of the mortgage contract."

[From the St. Paul Pioneer Press, Jan. 10, 1934]

MORTGAGE MORATORIUM RESULTS

The mortgage moratorium law upheld Monday by the United States Supreme Court was enacted at the regular session of the Minnesota Legislature a year ago in the belief that the difficulties of farm and home owners were principally caused by foreclosure policies of owners of the underlying mortgages. The legislature accordingly provided that such a debtor may apply to a district court for an additional 2 years of time to redeem his property. If the court is satisfied that the debtor is in good faith and operating the property with reasonable prudence, it can grant the additional time, fixing some just rental payment and other terms. It is this law the Supreme Court has ruled valid and not an unconstitutional impairment of a contract.

Experience under the law has not been quite what was expected. It has been found, for example, that very often the trouble is caused not by the owner of the first mortgage but by some minor lien holder. Many of the larger creditors, especially the institutional creditors, such as insurance companies, declare that they have on their books and in use more liberal moratoriums than that in the law. The mortgage owner is usually more eager than anyone else to keep a good farmer on the land. Sale of the property and eviction is in such cases the last resort, not the first. In a surprising number of cases it is necessary to persuade the debtor not to abandon the property.

The courts in applying the moratorium law in general do about the same thing that a reasonable creditor would do. Although here and there a creditor has been made the victim of petty chiseling, the law on the whole has worked with reasonable satisfactoriness on both sides. An amendment has been suggested to require a bond to assure the upkeep and maintenance of the property during the moratorium period and it seems a reasonable one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL "LANDS"

Two solar plexus blows on methods of exploitation treasured by the capitalist system were landed at Washington, D.C., in a single week. Credit goes first to the men and women who elected them, and then in full measure to Governor Olson and particularly to Atty. Gen. Harry H. Peterson, and to the latter's corps of assistants—all of whom are active Farmer-Laborites.

Scarcely had telegraph wires quieted from the news that Minnesota's mortgage moratorium law had been upheld by the United States Supreme Court when another flash shocked the Nation into attention—the State of Alabama dismissed its case involving the sale in this State of goods produced in Alabama prisons. Both cases had been argued before the high Court by Attorney General Peterson.

In spite of reactionary politicians and over the violent protest of big-business newspapers, Farmer-Laborites of Minnesota are beginning to halt—not yet to root out, but to halt—some vicious features of the economic system used to exploit the common people. In the interests of simple justice they even penetrate prison walls holding convicted enemies of society.

Farmer-Laborites! Heads up, eyes front, and shoulders erect! Principles of the Farmer-Labor movement of Minnesota openly and effectively challenge the world-wide, international capitalist system. The fight is on in earnest!

CONGRESSMAN LUNDEEN DEFENDS THE MORTGAGE MORATORIUM IN AN OPEN LETTER TO LOAN CORPORATIONS

GENTLEMEN: After a meeting at the offices of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, attended by you and certain other Government officials and representatives of certain insurance companies and financial institutions, you announced to the press that "the whole mortgage situation is being greatly embarrassed and retarded by laws that are being passed in different States giving unusual moratorium privileges."

I wish to lodge vigorous protest against this statement. The Federal Government should have given prompt aid to the home owners and farm owners of America. Had this been done, moratorium laws would not be necessary. Had the machinery set up by the Federal administration functioned properly and brought swift relief there would be no talk of embarrassment now.

I call your attention to the opinion of Hon. Harry H. Peterson, Farmer-Labor attorney general of Minnesota, who fought this battle of human rights against property rights before the Supreme Court of the United States. Attorney General Peterson has wired me as follows:

"The Minnesota mortgage moratorium law does not interfere with the program of the Federal loaning agencies. It was passed before such agencies were in existence and in the belief that when they came into existence such agencies would provide the necessary money to refinance farm and home mortgages.

"The extensions provided for by the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law were necessary because of the failure of the Federal Government to act and to save the farms and homes of our people, which the Supreme Court of the United States held is a 'basic interest of society' until the Federal Government does act. Just as soon as Federal loaning agencies provide needed money, State extensions will end.

"The act by its terms is not applicable to loans by the United States Government and its agencies. It cannot interfere with Federal loans.

"It is pertinent to observe that the Federal Government, true to form, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has taken care of those at the top first—the railroads, banks, and insurance companies—and then gave postponed attention to those at the bottom, the farm and the home owners, who constitute the mass of the people and really are the Nation. Until the Federal Government has done as good a job for the people as it has for big business, Mr. Jones' remarks are not in order.

"The statement made by Mr. Jesse H. Jones, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and John H. Fahey, chairman of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, 'that the whole mortgage situation is being greatly embarrassed and retarded' by State mortgage moratorium laws is utterly untrue and is based upon either a misconception of the purposes of this law or ignorance of its provisions.

"It is evident that mortgage moratorium laws are still needed and desirable. Because of the failure of the Federal Government and its agencies to provide needed money, Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, and a score of other States are even now contemplating the enactment of mortgage moratorium laws to protect their farm and home owners until the Federal Government and its agencies do act. The 'basic interest of society' needs this protection."

Government officials and Members of Congress especially should read the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law and the Supreme Court's decision which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 10, 1934. The homes and farms of the American people must be protected from destruction at the hands of certain financial institutions.

MORTGAGE MORATORIUM LAW UPHELD—U.S. HIGH COURT RULES STATE'S MOVE JUSTIFIED—EMERGENCY HELD VALID BASIS FOR SUSPENDING CONTRACT PROVISIONS—HUGHES GIVES OPINION IN 5-TO-4 VOTE—UPHOLDING OF NEW DEAL FORESEEN—SUPPORT OF NEW DEAL LEGISLATION INDICATED

By George F. Authier

WASHINGTON, January 8.—Approval of the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law by the Supreme Court, in its 5-to-4 decision, was generally regarded here Monday night as one of the most momentous decisions handed down since the famous Dred Scott decision, in which the Court went along the lines of interpretation of the letter of the Constitution. In Monday's decision the Court follows the precedent of interpreting the fundamental law of the land by taking into consideration new conditions.

Chief Justice John Marshall initiated the practice of "interpreting" the Constitution, and the tendency has grown since. To some students of the Constitution it has grown to alarming proportions. To others it merely is in keeping with the times, tending to make the document more elastic.

USE CALAMITY POWERS

The outstanding feature of the decision, as seen here, is that an economic emergency is regarded in the nature of a great public calamity, comparable to fire, flood, or earthquake.

Given such a situation, the power reserved to the State under the Constitution, can be invoked by the legislature, and it may apply to variations in the manner in which a contract may be fulfilled or enforced.

With such an interpretation it is easily seen that the startling legislation of the new deal, much of which has been assailed here and there as unconstitutional, receives prominent support. While the Court dwells on the fact the contract remains sacred, and its fulfillment merely is postponed, the fact that it assumes the economic depression in Minnesota and elsewhere is a justification for the legislation enacted in that State makes it reasonable to assume that other legislation, both National and State, would receive similar approval for the same reason.

CONSERVATIVES GRAVE

The existence of an emergency may be spread to cover a multitude of things, and in this decision is seen probable approval of practices growing out of the National Recovery Administration, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and various other features of the new deal.

How far the interpretation of the Constitution might go is puzzling students of the Constitution, and there is grave shaking of heads among those who agree with the minority opinion, read by Justice Sutherland and concurred in by Minnesota's representative on the Court, Justice Pierce Butler.

STAMPS HUGHES AS LIBERAL

The decision renewed the grouping of the present Supreme Court as among "liberals" and "conservatives", so-called. It definitely placed Chief Justice Hughes among the liberal group, regardless of the fact that he was appointed as a judge of conservative leanings, and his confirmation was opposed by the liberal group in the Senate.

Both sides to the controversy growing out of the new deal realize the decision is so close that upon other and more direct issues the Court might decide differently. The group of four who oppose the majority may be relied upon, it is thought, to maintain the fundamental views expressed by them, while the majority decision deals with an immediate application of laws to conditions and might, in one instance or more, change with a different situation.

MORATORIUM SUSTAINED BY HIGHEST COURT—MINNESOTA MORTGAGE LAW HELD VALID BY UNITED STATES SUPREME BENCH, 5 TO 4—DECISION EXPECTED TO AFFECT N.R.A. VITALLY—STATE STATUTE DECLARED FULLY WITHIN CONSTITUTION, WITHOUT CREATING NEW POWERS

By Charles B. Cheney

WASHINGTON, January 9.—Speaker of the House H. T. RAINEY predicted today that the Supreme Court, which yesterday upheld the Minnesota moratorium law, would sustain every N.R.A. code so far enacted.

In one of the most important decisions announced by the United States Supreme Court in recent years, the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law was upheld late yesterday. The Court stood 5 to 4, as it has many times in critical cases. The decision may have a far-reaching effect.

LAW WAS HELD INVALID

The case originally was brought in Hennepin County District Court, where Judge Arthur L. Selover held the law invalid. On appeal the State supreme court reversed the decision, Justice Royal A. Stone alone dissenting.

Appeal was taken, and the United States Supreme Court expedited consideration because of the time element involved. The case attracted Nation-wide attention because similar laws in other States were involved, to say nothing of the Federal acts under the new deal.

The case was argued November 8. Attorney General Harry H. Peterson and William S. Ervin, one of his assistants, spoke for the act, which was attacked in arguments by Karl H. Covell and Alfred W. Bowen, Minneapolis attorneys.

MORATORIUM DECISION PLEASES HOME OWNERS—MORTGAGE LAW UPHELD IN SUPREME COURT RULING

Some 4,000 Minnesota home owners today greeted with relief the United States Supreme Court decision upholding constitutionality of the Minnesota mortgage moratorium act, passed by the 1933 State legislature to provide extension of the redemption period to May 1, 1935.

With about 4,000 such cases pending in the State, approximately 550 such cases have been started in Hennepin County District Court, according to George H. Hemperley, clerk of district court. More than half of the cases already have been heard and relief granted pending the decision handed down late Monday, he said.

Mr. Peterson said the decision would save thousands of homes from foreclosure throughout the country.

George C. Stiles, Minneapolis attorney, who assisted in drawing the original bill for consideration by the State legislature and who fought the case along in the district court, said he was "extremely pleased by the decision, which upholds the right of the individual to safeguard his property."

[From the Minneapolis Star, Jan. 10, 1934]

THE MORTGAGE MORATORIUM UPHELD

A majority opinion by the United States Supreme Court has upheld the validity of Minnesota's mortgage moratorium act, thus recognizing the emergency that exists among home owners throughout the country and giving them, by reason of that emergency, a chance to hold their homes in the face of it.

In defending the act it might well be asked: If this isn't an emergency, what would be? If this isn't a time to make some concession to those who have invested their savings into homes of their own, when would be?

The Supreme Court's decision is in accord with the American creed that the home and home ownership should be the last to collapse under economic pressure. When a man and family lose their home their anchor is torn loose from the spot of earth they called their own, their pride in that anchorage is dealt a fatal blow, the confusion of the depression is worse confounded. This law extends the redemption period to May 1, 1935, when the recovery program should be far enough advanced to save many homes which otherwise would be lost and irrecoverable. It is a humane and human measure, and the Court's decision behind its technical phraseology identifies it as such.

MINNESOTA AGAIN SETS PACE

The validation by the United States Supreme Court of the mortgage moratorium law enacted by the Minnesota Legislature at its last regular session is another feather in the hat of the Farmer-Labor administration under the leadership of Gov. Floyd B. Olson, and will no doubt be the means of giving the farmer and home owner in other States the same relief offered by Minnesota.

It is through the leadership of Governor Olson that Minnesota is becoming a byword for those who feel that the old order must go and that it must be replaced by something that will benefit society. Governor Olson, through the Farmer-Labor Party, is advocating fundamental changes that if proposed a few years back would have caused a great many people to throw up their hands in holy horror and howl socialism, radicalism, bolshevism, and other terms that were aimed to turn the people's minds against their own best interests.

Conditions, however, have compelled the people to delve a little more into the fundamentals necessary to bring about a change, but a leadership was needed to propose and carry out these changes. That leadership was conferred on Governor Olson by the people of Minnesota, and that the people made no mistake is conclusively proved by the undaunted courage displayed by the State's chief executive in advocating and carrying out fundamental changes that are being adopted by other States. It is this kind of leadership that is placing Minnesota in the forefront, causing this State to be set up as a model by other States in the fight for economic justice.

SETTING ASIDE OF CONTRACTS IS RULED LEGAL—SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS MINNESOTA LAW

WASHINGTON, January 8.—The Supreme Court upheld a Minnesota law Monday in a ruling immediately interpreted in the Capital as auguring well for the wide variety of emergency legislation enacted under President Roosevelt's program.

The decision upheld the right of a State to suspend contracts in an emergency, such as was provided by the depression. The law, which the Court held valid, extended the time in which mortgaged property sold under foreclosure might be redeemed.

The right of contracts and of the Government to set them aside in an emergency was debated last April and May while several of the bills of the President's emergency program were before Congress.

FARM DECISION NOT RULE ON N.R.A., DECLARES BECK—CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY SAYS COURT DID NOT PASS ON CONGRESS POWER

Representative BECK, an acknowledged constitutional authority and a Republican, at the request of the Associated Press, wrote the following view of the significance of the Supreme Court action upholding the emergency Minnesota mortgage moratorium law:

(By JAMES M. BECK, Representative of Pennsylvania and former Solicitor General of the United States)

WASHINGTON, January 9.—The alphabetical excrescences of our already swollen bureaucracy should not take too much encouragement from the Supreme Court decision in the recent Minnesota case.

In my judgment it does not necessarily validate the more disputable features of the emergency legislation, for the Supreme Court was not considering the powers of Congress under the Constitution, but only the power of the Legislature of Minnesota.

COURT RULING CITED

That great Court has repeatedly stated that its opinions must be confined to the precise question which it was adjudicating. In this case the question was whether the Federal Constitution prevented the State of Minnesota, under its reserved powers, from suspending the remedial processes of its courts for a limited period in the matter of foreclosing mortgages.

As a sovereign State, Minnesota has all legislative power except such as it and other States had delegated to the Federal Government under the Constitution. The United States Supreme Court has now held, by a bare majority, that the temporary suspension by a State of the right of foreclosure is not an impairment of a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution.

OFFICIALS SEE RELIEF SPUR IN DECISION—ACTION HELD FORECAST OF FAVORABLE STAND ON N.R.A. IN LEGAL TEST OF PLAN

WASHINGTON, January 9.—The belief that the Supreme Court's validation of Minnesota's mortgage moratorium law might lighten the Federal task of refinancing farm and home indebtedness was expressed today by Farm Credit Administration and Home Owners' Loan Corporation officials.

The Court's decision upheld State legislation extending the time for redemption of property foreclosed for nonpayment of mortgage indebtedness and containing other provisions to ease the debtors' burden.

MORE STATES TO ACT

Officials said today almost 20 States had enacted legislation which followed similar lines and that many legislatures meeting this year probably would pass such laws now that the Minnesota statute had been declared constitutional.

One of the principal benefits to the work of the Home Loan and Farm Credit Administrations, officials said, was that an extension of the time for redemption would allow, in many instances, a sufficient period for a Federal loan on the property or a scaling-down of the indebtedness if its present value is insufficient to cover the amount due.

GUARANTY TO BE EXTENDED

Difficulty that the two organizations have had in getting their bonds accepted by creditors is expected to be dissipated if Congress guarantees the principal as well as the interest on the securities.

President Roosevelt is to send a request for such legislation to Congress tomorrow.

Administration supporters generally took the attitude that the Minnesota case forecast decisions upholding the National Industrial Recovery Act, the farm adjustment measure, and other emergency legislation backed by the President.

DISSENTING OPINION

The four dissenting judges, in an opinion by Justice Sutherland, took the view the Minnesota law impaired the sanctity of contracts.

The majority, through Chief Justice Hughes, found that there was a situation in Minnesota which demanded relief if the State had power to give it, and that the State possessed such authority, even if it meant that mortgage holders were denied for a time the foreclosure rights laid down in the contracts made with their debtors.

The Chief Justice said the Minnesota statute should be sustained as a law for "the protection of a basic interest of society."

HUGHES ONCE ASSAILED

Only 3 years ago the Chief Justice was assailed in the Senate as a man who thought more of the rights of property than he did the rights of the individual.

The occasion was his nomination to succeed the late William Howard Taft as Chief Justice. Hughes was confirmed after Senate progressives lambasted him.

He surprised them, and the conservatives, too, by siding with the liberal element to uphold Indiana's chain-store tax.

He left the conservatives also in the California syndicalism case; the Minnesota newspaper gag law; and a series of others, although he has sided with the conservatives now and then, particularly with regard to tax legislation.

[From the Nation]

The Supreme Court, as "Mr. Dooley" once astutely remarked, follows the election returns. Sometimes, of course, it is a good many years behind them, but by and large it has bowed to the public will in interpreting the Federal Constitution during the century and a half of that document's existence. Obviously it has had to. Otherwise we should have had to scrap the Constitution or Government would have had to cease to be a living organism. In reading the judgment of the Court on the Minnesota law establishing a moratorium on foreclosures of mortgages, we feel that Chief Justice Hughes, supported by Justices Brandeis, Stone, Roberts, and Cardozo, has bowed to the inevitable rather than expounded the certain. The minority opinion—by Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler—is an impressive statement of cold logic, but must be discarded for what Justice Hughes aptly calls "the protection of a basic interest of society." Had the Minnesota statute stood alone, the Court might have upheld the letter of the Constitution and thrown out the law, but with our whole recovery legislation hanging by the same thread the path of necessity was plain. It is fortunate for the country—and for the Court—that the Minnesota law has been upheld but the circumstances must increase the amazement of all thinking persons at a system whereby policy vital to 120,000,000 people depends upon a 5 to 4 vote among nine men.

[From the Christian Century]

SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS EMERGENCY LEGISLATION

Debate over the constitutionality of the new deal sank to a whisper after the Supreme Court rendered its verdict on January 8 upholding the Minnesota law granting a 2-year moratorium on mortgages. To be sure, the decision said nothing about any of the Federal measures which have been enacted under the Roosevelt administration. But it laid down a theory of implied powers in an emergency, applicable to the contract provision of the first amendment, the promise of due process of law, and equal-protection guaranties which—some have claimed would be invoked to upset the constitutionality of the N.R.A. and its cognate recovery measures. The vote in the Court was 5 to 4, Chief Justice Hughes not only holding the balance of power but writing the majority decision. Two things stand out in this approval of the Minnesota law which make it almost certain that the Court will hold constitutional Mr. Roosevelt's Federal recovery measures. First, the Court granted that the existence of an economic emergency is sufficient justification for the exercise of extraordinary powers, unless such exercise is explicitly forbidden by the Constitution. Second, the Court laid down the principle that changing social and economic conditions justify the State in establishing unprecedented measures of industrial control. "The question", it said, "is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but of the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends." On such a constitutional principle, Mr. Roosevelt's new deal can build without misgiving. The Minnesota moratorium decision will take its place among the historic verdicts of the Supreme Court.

LAW UPHELD—MINNESOTA'S MORTGAGE MORATORIUM IS RULED VALID

A straw in the wind last week indicated that the Supreme Court breeze is at present blowing in the new deal's favor.

Handing down a 5–4 decision, the Court upheld a Minnesota moratorium statute, the first piece of emergency legislation upon which it has been called to decide. The decision showed Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Stone—the Supreme Court's unpredictables—were lining up with the progressives, Justices Brandeis, Cardozo, and Roberts, against the conservatives, Justice Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler.

It also made of John H. Blaisdell (who otherwise might have lived, lost his home, and died comparatively unknown) a possible Dred Scott of the new deal.

For it was John Blaisdell who mortgaged his Minneapolis home in 1926, then saw the mortgage foreclosed and the home sold May 2, 1932. If he wanted it back his contract gave him only 1 year to redeem it. But April 18, 1933—2 weeks before the period of redemption expired—Minnesota passed its mortgage moratorium law. It permitted the courts to extend redemption periods up to May 1, 1935. John Blaisdell asked an extension of the lower court, was denied, and appealed to the State supreme court. It reversed the lower court and ordered it to grant his plea. So then the mortgage company, Home Building & Loan Association, appealed through the State courts and finally to the United States Supreme Court, which heard argument last November.

John Blaisdell's lawyers emphasized the emergency existing when the law was passed. The mortgage company was presenting its case when Justice Brandeis leaned over the Supreme Court desk.

"The situation has led the Federal Government to do what it has never done before. The universality and magnitude of the situation must be considered. What do you say to that?" he asked lawyers for the mortgage company.

"There is no emergency", they replied, "which will suspend the limitations of the Federal Constitution." They said the Minnesota statute governing the case was unconstitutional because it impaired a contract, deprived the company of property without due process of law, and did not operate equally upon all.

But after more than a month's deliberation, the Supreme Court denied all the mortgage company's contentions and decided that the Constitution had not been violated.

"Emergency", said Chief Justice Hughes this Monday, reading the opinion he had written, "does not create power, but emergency may create occasion for the exercise of power which exists." That power was the "reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community."

SUPREME COURT MAKES THE NEW DEAL MORE SECURE—DECISION UPHOLDING THE MINNESOTA MORTGAGE MORATORIUM LAW, THE FIRST TEST OF THE ROOSEVELT PROGRAM, IS HAILED AS ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT IN YEARS

John Blaisdell and the new deal were both made more secure last week when the Supreme Court of the United States, dividing 5 to 4, decided that Mr. Blaisdell could have more time to pay that $3,700 mortgage on his Minneapolis home. The decision, upholding the Minnesota mortgage moratorium law and settling the first case brought since the inauguration of the new deal is hailed throughout the country as one of the most important in a generation—or longer.

The specific issue was the constitutionality of the Minnesota law extending the time for redemption of mortgaged property sold under foreclosure. But it involved the far more vital general principle whether in emergency the public welfare takes precedence over individual rights.

"While the case involved the power of a State rather than any Federal law", said David Lawrence, well-known Washington correspondent, "the principles underlying the decision are just the same as if the National Industrial Recovery Act had been under consideration.

The majority opinion, written by Chief Justice Hughes, with Justices Brandeis, Stone, Roberts, and Cardozo concurring and Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler dissenting, "was regarded as tremendously significant", said the Washington correspondent of the New York Times, "and as an absolute test of the Court's views on programs of an emergency nature which President Roosevelt and his lieutenants might now propose." The minority opinion was written by Justice Sutherland.

"There is no question," said Theodore C. Wallen, of the New York Herald Tribune, "that the Supreme Court had considered the Minnesota moratorium law in the light of the far greater ramifications of President Roosevelt's recovery program. Nor was there any doubt that the key men of the Roosevelt administration, in the present plans to develop a permanent new order, were looking to the Supreme Court to reinterpret the Constitution in the light of the changed economic conditions wrought by the depression."

But "the decision gives no comfort to advocates of permanent revolutionary change," according to Mark Sullivan, also writing in the New York Herald Tribune, "because of the emphasis it puts on the emergency nature of the legislation. As Chief Justice Hughes puts it: 'The legislation is temporary in operation. It is limited to the exigency which called it forth. * * * The operation of the statute itself could not validly outlast the emergency.'"

And Mr. Lawrence, previously quoted, added that while the Supreme Court "is in tune with the new deal—at least so far as temporary measures are concerned—it will not be when the laws are extended or renewed on the ground that an emergency still prevails."

But temporary or not, observers agree that while the Court will decide each case on its merits, the new deal is safe—the decision upholds the President in his recovery program and strikes a heavy blow at critics who had charged infringements of the Constitution.

In the words of Governor Olson, of the State where the case originated, the decision "represents a triumph of human rights over property rights. It also indicates that we can change the system under which we live in any manner we desire and keep within the Constitution."

Following are excerpts from editorials in representative papers in all parts of the country showing the reaction to the Supreme Court's decision:

THE NORTH AND EAST

New York Herald Tribune (Republican):

"The first thing to be said of the decision is that it does not attempt to adjudicate beyond the depression. Applying the same principle to the National Industrial Act there is not the slightest hint of any revolutionary approach to the Constitution which might encourage the Tugwell group of advisers in their hope of establishing a permanently planned order of society directed from Washington."

Philadelphia Record (independent):

"The Minnesota mortgage decision is probably the most important decision since the Dred Scott case. What it does is to free America from slavish subservience to a literal interpretation of the Constitution, which has for years served to stifle liberalism, block progress, and protect vested interests."

Philadelphia Inquirer (Republican):

"While the decision relates to the rights of a State and not to congressional enactment, the principle is precisely the same. It is of far-reaching importance. It seems to indicate that the Supreme Court will sustain the legality of N.R.A. and other governmental enterprises so long as they are of a temporary nature."

Newark Evening News (independent):

"The Hughes decision is basically conservative in that, while it places the community first, it protects the individual in the ownership of his home and property."

Washington Post (independent):

"The general reaction to this historic decision is likely to be that it was foreordained by circumstances."

Boston Transcript (Republican):

"It is with a shiver of apprehension we read that possible destruction of the great structure of the N.R.A. was prevented in the Supreme Court of the United States only by a 5 to 4 decision. There is, however, a lesson even in this narrowness. It was sufficient to save the country from the inconceivable consequences of a sudden wrecking of the N.R.A. It also is a solemn statement of how close to the danger line the administration stands and a warning to demagogues that they must not force the Government into chimerical schemes."

Springfield Republican (independent):

"No blanket approval for the emergency legislation of Congress can be inferred from this decision. But it does nevertheless imply that powers broadly and reasonably exercised by Congress would receive favorable consideration for the duration of the emergency even if a conflict with the Constitution could be shown to exist."

THE SOUTH

Baltimore Sun (independent Democratic):

"The court, speaking through its liberal majority, has alined itself in favor of a liberal rather than a strict construction of the Constitution, which suggests a disposition to legalize emergency legislation if a way can be found to do so."

Charleston (W.Va.) Gazette (Democratic):

"A blind man can read in the present decision a clear indication that the highest court in the land intends to recognize the N.R.A. and the recovery program of the President. The administration's foes, who cloak their antagonism under the guise of a great love for the Constitution will take no solace from the Minnesota moratorium decision."

New Orleans Times-Picayune (Democratic):

"In a very real sense this test case involved a ruling on the national recovery plan and policy."

Kansas City Journal-Post (independent):

"A decision of great social importance. * * * The psychology of the people is a definite element in recovery and nothing makes for discontent more than loss of farms and homes because of general conditions over which the mortgagee has no control."

Norfolk Virginian-Pilot (independent Democratic):

"The 'public welfare' has risen above 'individual rights.' A history-making decision."

Dallas News (independent Democratic):

"In the Minnesota decision the court has made one of the most remarkable displays of liberal thought in the entire history of the usually conservative tribunal."

WEST AND PACIFIC COAST

Grand Forks (N.Dak.) Herald (independent Republican):

"As the case stands, the Court accepts the theory that back of the written contract stands the authority of the State to safeguard the vital interests of the people and this right cannot be alienated by any process whatever."

Helena (Mont.) Independent:

"The decision is hailed by farmers and their political friends as a great victory when as a matter of fact it will eventually be a costly decision to the class moratoriums are supposed to benefit."

Los Angeles Times (independent Republican):

"The decision probably will turn out to be as much a turning point in constitutional interpretation as was the famous 'rule of reason' decision in antitrust cases."

CENTRAL WEST

Chicago Tribune (Republican):

"An outstanding generalization of the opinion is that constitution guaranties, subject to construction, remain binding and inviolable."

Detroit Free Press (independent Republican):

"The prevailing opinion of the Supreme Court ought to be widely beneficial if only honest and temporary advantage is taken of it."

Milwaukee Journal (independent):

"The decision seems to us a major achievement in defense of the Constitution and our whole system of constitutional government. It defends the Constitution against two dangers which constantly threaten it. The first is the attack of the extremists, whether radicals or reactionaries, who in effect say the Constitution means anything you want it to mean. Secondly, it defends the Constitution against the literal-minded men who, if they were consistent in their logic, would make it unworkable so that the country would be moved to tear it up and either rewrite it or do without a Constitution."

Cleveland Plain Dealer (independent Democratic):

"A refreshing reminder that constitutional law is not a Medes and Persian kind of law, but a law that recognizes the difference between the eighteenth century and the twentieth."

St. Louis Post-Dispatch (independent Democratic):

"We commend the wisdom, and perhaps the ingenuity, of the majority of the Supreme Court in making the Constitution stretch without a break."

If I had permission to do so, I would here insert the various bills introduced in the Minnesota State Legislature which were forerunners of the present mortgage moratorium law. These forerunners are of historical interest. I am informed that there were at least 12 bills which preceded the present law and led up to its passage, and that there were also similar bills prepared by members of the Wisconsin, Nebraska, and other State legislatures.

Among the bills prepared by Minnesota legislators I have been informed of the following:

House File No. 32, by Representative Leonard Eriksson, of Fergus Falls.

House File No. 461, by Representatives Lewis Hefindahl, of Benson Township, in Swift County; Theo. E. Thorkelson, of Renville County; and Hjalmar Petersen, of Askov.

House File No. 252, by Representatives Lewis Herfindahl, of Swift County; Theo. E. Thorkelson, of Renville County; and August A. Zech, of Howard Lake.

House File No. 270, by Representatives Theo. E. Thorkelson, of Renville County, and Lewis Herfindahl, of Swift County.

House File No. 859, by Representatives Alex Lowe, of Hadley; Otto Goetsch, of Dexter; John L. Roebke, of Sherburn; George W. Olson, of Jackson County; Ralph E. Gryte, of Ruthton; and John I. Jordahl, of Lake Benton.

House File No. 1425, by Representatives Theo. E. Thorkelson, of Renville County, Lewis Herfindahl, of Swift County; Carl J. Eastvold, Jr., of Ortonville; and Eric Friberg, of Roseau.

Bills or contributions to bills by Senator Laura E. Naplin, of Thief River Falls; Senator George Nordlin, of St. Paul; and Representatives John Allard Weeks, of Minneapolis; Albert Pfaender, of New Ulm; O. K. Dahle, of Spring Grove; and Speaker Charles Munn, of Hennepin County.

A complete survey of the struggle for a Minnesota mortgage moratorium law would be a valuable contribution to American history. I hope that story will be placed in the RECORD at some future date, and I ask that Minnesotans who read the material here presented inform me of any names and facts omitted which will give information of interest to the general public.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, 5 minutes is insufficient time for me to tell you what I think you ought to know. I want to say that I agree heartily with my friend Congressman LUNDEEN, who has just finished speaking about the soldiers. I maintain they are not getting a square deal and will not until we repeal the Economy Act, which has taken away from the World War veterans, the Spanish War veterans, and their dependents the compensations and pensions to which they are entitled.

Since Congress opened I have introduced three bills. One of them asks the Federal Government to appropriate $20,000,000,000 to carry on the work which has been started by our good President, which the Democrats as well as Republicans are supporting.

I also introduced a bill whereby the soldiers shall have their pensions or compensations increased 30 percent.

Another bill I introduced was to provide an increase of 25 percent for all Federal employees who receive less than $3,000 a year. Now, Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I want to say that there are many employees working for less than $65 a month.

It is true there are poor women in these buildings of ours going to work at 5 o'clock in the morning, scrubbing and dusting, who are receiving but $50 a month. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I think it is inhuman to have men and women working for the Government and paying them wages that not even a black-and-white mule could exist on. I think it is the duty of the Members of this House to increase the salaries of the Federal employees, especially those who are not obtaining sufficient funds for adequate maintenance.

I do not doubt that every problem that confronts us could be solved if we would permit ourselves, as I have said many times, to be actuated by humanitarian motives. We could eradicate the slum districts, we could abolish poorhouses, we could bring about a pension system in this Government whereby the aged, the widows, and all those who are physically incapacitated could obtain an adequate pension. If this would be done they would not be compelled to get on their knees and ask the would-be charitable agencies for relief. I say it is an outrage that men and women who are willing to work cannot obtain work because they are physically incapacitated, or are too old to obtain employment.

Again, I say it is not a question whether we are Democrats or Republicans. We are here to represent the people and not political parties, and I know if we will do our utmost in representing the people of this country we are bound to bring all of the unfortunates out of the rut, who are now in it because of a depression. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am proud to know that we are getting some nonpartisans on both sides of the aisle. I am proud to know that the leaders of neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party represent or speak for all of the members of their party—from now on we are going to be citizens first and Republicans and Democrats afterward—all politicians look alike to us. From now on we are going to think and work for all of the people of the United States of America, and not only for Republicans or Democrats. May I say to my colleagues from New York, if a few of the Representatives from their State would come up here to the Speaker's desk and sign the petition to discharge the committee and bring the Frazier-Lemke bill out onto the floor for discussion and passage, that then the agricultural West would be more in sympathy with the ideas and suggestions of the gentlemen from New York.

I am now going to discuss, for just a few minutes, the proposed gag rule. The Constitution vests all legislative powers in the Congress of the United States. It says that Congress shall make the laws of this Nation. It vests the power of making the laws of this Nation in Congress and in Congress alone. If the Constitution means anything, it means that we will openly, fearlessly, and frankly discuss, debate, and consider the laws that we are about to pass upon. This is especially true when those laws are prepared by a so-called "brain trust"—humorously so called in the same sense, and to the same extent, and for the same reason that the tallest man you ever knew was called "Shorty" and the fattest man you ever knew was called "Slim." I maintain that the Members of Congress have the right to open discussion and debate, and to offer amendments on all of these bills. If we blindly surrender that power to outsiders who are not Members of Congress, then we may as well go home and tell our constituents that we serve no useful purpose here. But if we discuss, debate, and consider these laws openly and frankly as representatives of all the people and not as representatives of a party or faction, then and then only shall we be true to the trust imposed upon us by the Constitution and the founders of the Republic.

I am opposed to the gag rule that will be brought up here for adoption at noon tomorrow—the gag rule that will prevent Members from offering amendments or debating the provisions of the independent offices appropriation bill. I am especially opposed to that gag rule because it is brought in here now to help continue the crucifixion of the disabled soldiers, the veterans of this great Nation; I am opposed to it because I am satisfied that without that gag rule you will not be able to continue the crucifixion of the veterans of this Nation, and that the great wrong that you have done to the veterans by the adoption of the so-called "Economy Act" will be corrected.

The way we are treating the veterans of this Nation is a disgrace. We no longer protect the protectors of this Nation—the men who gave their limbs and their health and were willing to give their lives for the Nation. We are even misusing the veterans' hospitals that the people and taxpayers of this Nation built for the veterans. The doors of these hospitals are closed to many of the veterans—they cannot get hospitalization while the doors are open to men working for the C.W.A., the P.W.A., and the C.C.C. They, when in need, are given hospitalization in these hospitals. I have no objection to that, but I do want these hospitals to be equally open to the veterans. I do not want to see the veterans crucified any further.

I am opposed to the gag rule being applied to the independent offices appropriation bill, because it has for its aim and purpose to continue the cut of the salaries of Federal employees. This rule has for its purpose and object to continue the salary cut of the boys and girls who are working for the Government and who are trying to go to school and educate themselves.

Further, the object of this gag rule is to permit us to be untrue to our trust and to deceive the people of this Nation by voting for the rule first and then go home and tell our constituents, when we are taken to task for some of the things done here, that we could not help it; that we had no opportunity to debate or offer amendments to the bill because we were gagged. In other words, the object is to gag yourself first and then to say that you could not do anything because you were gagged. May I, however, say to you that for the first time in the history of this Nation the veterans and the farmers are watching each and every Member of this Congress, and that your record will be before them when you go before your constituents at the next election, and no Member will be permitted to hide behind the gag rule that they helped impose upon this Congress.

A great deal has been said here today about Democrats and Republicans. I am not concerned with either Republicans or Democrats. I am glad to note that there are a lot of nonpartisans on both sides of the aisle. I was elected as a nonpartisan on the Republican ticket. Suppose some of my Democratic friends get themselves elected as nonpartisans on the Democratic ticket. It is easy. The people are sick and tired of party lines. They are getting away from placing party above the people of the United States.

It has been suggested by my Republican colleague from New York that we were going back to the ideals of Cleveland and Coolidge. Let us permit the dead to repose in peace. This is the twentieth century. We are going forward, not backward. The suggestion has even been made that we are going back to Hoover. God forbid! We will never go back there. If you Democrats fail us now, then we will take a Jeffersonian-Lincoln Democrat and nominate him and elect him on the Republican ticket. We are going to be nonpartisans all the way through in the future. The time is here. We must defeat this gag rule. We must not permit ourselves to be gagged and then go home and tell our constituents that we could do nothing for them because we were gagged. We, new Members, elected to Congress for the first time, must not allow ourselves to be misled by party leaders because of the so-called "seniority rights" and "party alinements." We were elected to bring about a real new deal.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman says that we are going to be nonpartisan all the way through. Does the gentleman speak for the entire Membership on the other side of the aisle?

Mr. LEMKE. No; I speak only for the Cherokee strip over there. [Laughter.]

You know that strip is growing. May I say to the Republicans on my extreme left that a cyclone struck you in 1932, and if you, my Democratic friends on the extreme right, do not look out, a tornado will hit you. The people of this Nation have made up their minds that our slogan in the future shall be "Forward ever, backward never." We are going into a new age, a new civilization. Whether we like it or not, we cannot alter it. Whether we like it or not, we are being pushed forward.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. I listened, of course, with great pleasure, and was very much impressed with the speech which the gentleman has made, but I should like to know whether any attempt has been made to get this bill out, this bonus bill, by the usual process of legislation, by offering a resolution? Has the gentleman done that? I have voted twice on this measure, and I should like to see something done in an active way instead of all this talk.

Mr. LEMKE. The petitions to discharge the committees in charge of the Frazier-Lemke bill and the Patman bill are on the Speaker's desk; and if we get 145 signatures, then these bills will come up automatically for discussion and passage. There are about 67 signatures on the petition for the Frazier-Lemke bill, and almost the same number on the Patman bill. Now let us get busy and go up there and sign the petitions.

Mr. FOCHT. Why not get up in your place and vote? I have not been able to find it, and I have been here several months now. Why can you not offer a resolution, as I have done many times in the Pennsylvania Legislature, and put them all on record? Why does not the gentleman do that and do it in the regular way? Why run around behind the desk somewhere and sign a petition? The gentleman should wake up.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is it not a fact that the petition lying on the Clerk's desk is the only regular way in which it can be done, the Committee having refused to bring the bill out?

Mr. LEMKE. That is exactly correct.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman mean to say that is not correct parliamentary practice to offer a resolution to discharge the committee and take a vote on it?

Mr. BOILEAU. That petition is now on the desk, which we are asking the gentleman to sign.

Mr. FOCHT. I will sign it as far as that is concerned, but can you not take a vote on the resolution?

Mr. BOILEAU. Not until we get 145 signatures.

Mr. LEMKE. That is the rule of the House. Some Members are even talking about changing that rule and making it more difficult. That is part of the system of the gag rule, and, as I understand, some of my Republican friends and Democratic friends attempted to form a coalition and change the required number of signatures from 145 to 218. I should like to see them try it, because I am confident that it cannot be done in this House, unless I misjudge the temper of the Members who compose this House.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman mean to say that this body of men, sent here to represent the sovereign will of the people, cannot get that bill before the House?

Mr. LEMKE. They cannot.

Mr. FOCHT. I say you are very weak on parliamentary procedure if you admit that fact.

Mr. LEMKE. I am sorry but the obtaining of 145 signatures is the only parliamentary procedure under the rules of the House.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEMKE. Certainly.

Mr. BOILEAU. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] would tell us how to do it, because many of us are anxious to do it. I do not know how it can be done under the parliamentary rules of this House.

Mr. FOCHT. As I understand, you have a requirement that before you offer a resolution, a petition must be signed by at least a hundred Members. I call that rank Democratic gag rule.

Mr. BOILEAU. Well, I do not know whether it is gag rule or not, but it is the rule of the House.

Mr. FOCHT. There is no other bill in this House as important as that one relating to the relief of the soldiers and their widows. I say the sovereign will of the people can be expressed here, and I will show you a way before long, if you are going to delay by trying to get 200 names to a petition.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEMKE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am very sympathetic with his views; but I do say that under the parliamentary procedure, I know of no other way by which these bills can be brought out, and if the gentleman knows of such a way I am sure many of us will be very, very pleased to get the information.

Mr. FOCHT. I certainly will show you a way.

Mr. BOILEAU. Thank you very kindly.

Mr. LEMKE. I want to say that I am in whole-hearted accord with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and will work together with him. I will call on the gentleman tonight to have him show us a way, if the Sargeant at Arms does not put us out. We will get together and bring this bill out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. When the Republican Party was in power in this House, did not the rule require 218 signatures?

Mr. LEMKE. It was 218 until there was a deadlock and they could not elect a Speaker, and you good Democrats and a few in the Cherokee strip here changed it to 145. I want to thank you for calling our attention to it.

In conclusion permit me to suggest that the time has come when we stop crucifying the veterans of this Nation—when we restore their disability compensation and hospitalization. The time has come when we should restore the salaries of the underpaid employees of this Nation—at least those who are getting small salaries. I am not concerned about the men with the high salaries. I am confident the time is here to reduce the salaries of those who are getting over $10,000.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman know that the Capitol police receive but $85 a month?

Mr. LEMKE. I know that; and I know, too, that the boys who take us up and down in the elevators get about $80.

Mr. DUNN. I agree with the gentleman in his attitude.

Mr. LEMKE. If there is a deficit in our revenue, then I again suggest that we suspend the interest on the public debt for 2 or 3 years. [Applause.] That would be far better than to continue our mistreatment of the veterans and the Federal employees. Suspend this interest and pass the Frazier-Lemke bill refinancing the farmers at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuing tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds, but by issuing Federal Reserve notes, and pass the Patman bill and pay the soldiers' compensation in cash, not by issuing tax-exempt bonds, but by issuing Treasury notes. Then there will be no need to guarantee the principal as well as the interest of tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds in the hands of coupon clippers. Then there will be no deficit. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to make a speech in 5 minutes, but I sought this time to call attention to the progress which has been made by one of the regional agricultural credit corporations in my State, which is located at Pine Bluff, Ark., in my district, the Sixth Congressional District of Arkansas.

I received a letter from my good friend, W. A. Ragon, a brother of our former colleague, Hon. Heartsill Ragon, who has been assistant manager.

With this letter he transmits a statement of the work done by this corporation and the results accomplished. I think it will be of interest to tell you how successfully this plan has worked out for agriculture in my State.

This one regional corporation at Pine Bluff, serving several counties, made 5,893 loans this last year, amounting to a total of $3,110,527.18. Of these loans, 4,848 have been paid in full, amounting to $2,745,420.08, leaving but 1,045 loans which have not been collected in full, amounting in money to a total of $365,107.10, and I am informed by Mr. Ragon that most of these loans will be collected. He says they will collect 98 percent of the more than $3,000,000 loaned by this corporation to farmers. The small farmers are the kind of people who have been taken care of largely with this character of loans.

My good friend the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. FULMER, a member of the Committee on Agriculture, on which committee I have the honor to serve, has introduced a bill to extend loans of this character for another year. I believe it ought to be done. I was for the bill passed last year providing for the setting up of cooperative loans, but there is a feature in that legislation which I am afraid will militate against the man who has to ask for small loans.

You will remember that in the plan which is entered into with cooperative associations for borrowing, the borrower must subscribe for 5 percent of stock. This is for the purpose of preventing losses. For instance, if 50 of us were going to go into a cooperative association for borrowing, each of us would take 5 percent of the stock to guarantee payment of the loans and we would be exceedingly careful about whom we take into this organization. I am afraid this plan will militate against the small man. Unless this restriction is lightened, the beneficial effects of the legislation will not reach one quarter of the territory which can be served by the organizations which have been formed.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House what interest was paid by these poor tenant farmers?

Mr. GLOVER. I understand it was 6 percent.

Mr. HOEPPEL. And the gentleman recognizes, does he not, that bankers are paying only 2½ percent on money they borrow?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; I recognize that, but I do not have time to enter into a discussion of that question now with only minutes of time allotted to me.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Certainly not.

Mr. GLOVER. There is a class of farmers who have not been helped by the legislation we have passed, and I feel that provisions should be made in the law to allow us to help them.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. What is the general nature of the business in the neighborhoods of which he speaks?

Mr. GLOVER. Farming.

Mr. PIERCE. They are not in the dairying and cattle business?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; both dairying and cattle raising are carried on in this district, as well as general farming——

Mr. PIERCE. Is it largely a cotton-raising district?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; many of the loans now outstanding are secured on cotton which is held and not yet sold.

Mr. PIERCE. Precisely.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I challenge anybody to show any organization for the relief of agriculture, or the conduct of any other enterprise, an organization fostered by the Government which can make a better showing than this.

Mr. Chairman, in order that the House may have the benefit of this statement, which is particularized, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by having this letter and statement included therein.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Congressman D. D. GLOVER,
Malvern, Ark.

DEAR MR. GLOVER: While in the office several days ago you requested the writer to send you a current statement of the operations of the organization for the year of 1933.

Enclosed is statement made up as of the close of business, December 15, giving detailed information from date of organization to December 15.

Upon careful examination of this statement, think you will find it a very interesting document and one that reflects credit upon you as well as other Members of Congress who had a part in the making of a bill creating the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation.

Shall be glad to furnish any additional information you might desire.

With the compliments of the season, I am,

Very truly yours,

W. A. RAGON, Assistant Manager.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Members who are present this afternoon, because it appears that we have a liberal audience of Congressmen.

Tomorrow when the independent offices bill is under discussion there will be a group of reactionary Members of Congress here, and they will state that the President demands this and he demands that, and then add: "Now, like galley slaves, gentlemen, we plead with you to support the administration and keep the Federal employees from receiving a just restoration of their pay."

Mr. WOODRUM. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him to yield for a moment in order that we may rise and receive a report?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield; certainly.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BANKHEAD] having assumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 6663, the independent offices bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RULE FOR CONSIDERATION OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES BILL

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

House Resolution 217

Resolved, That during the consideration of H.R. 6663, a bill making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent bureaus, boards, commissions and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, all points of order against title II or any provisions contained therein are hereby waived; and no amendments or motions to strike out shall be in order to such title except amendments or motions to strike out offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations and said amendments or motions shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments shall not be in order to any other section of the bill H.R. 6663, or to any section of any general appropriation bill of the Seventy-third Congress which would be in conflict with the provisions of title II of the bill H.R. 6663, as reported to the House, except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 6663, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Those of us who are opposed to the gag rule will not have an opportunity to speak tomorrow on the rule. For that reason I am pleading with and appealing to every Member of the Congress who is in favor of a just pay scale for our Federal employees to vote against this rule, unless we have liberty of action in connection with amendments to this proposed bill.

In addition thereto, I hope those of you who have expressed yourselves as being in favor of restoration of pay to our Federal workers will go to the desk and sign the petition which I have caused to be placed there. I do not believe in pussyfooting. Those who have gone on record as favoring restoration to the Federal employees of the amount of their 15-percent pay cut should stand on their own feet. They should not take dictation from any group in this House or elsewhere.

I am also in favor of increasing the pay of the boys in the C.C.C. camps. I found during the past summer that these boys were receiving subsistence allowance of only 33 cents per day, whereas the N.R.A. men, working on the same projects, were receiving $1.05 per day.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does not the gentleman also believe in increasing the pay of the soldiers, sailors, and marines?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes; I am coming to that in a moment.

Here is another feature to which I wish to refer. Just because veterans are receiving as low as $6 a month, they are being denied work with the C.W.A. Because our underpaid postal substitutes receive a small, insignificant salary, much less than $50 a month on an average, they are also denied the opportunity to work under the C.W.A. I cannot imagine anything more inhuman and more incompetent than the opinion of the Comptroller General, who ruled that the postal substitutes must take a deduction of 15 percent in pay, notwithstanding the fact that many of them receive less than $25 per month.

We are also denying our veterans, the Spanish-American War veterans especially, county relief under the subterfuge that they are receiving $15 per month. In the county of Los Angeles, if they have their homes paid for, the county will not extend any aid to them until the veterans assign their homes to the county, and then the county graciously gives to these disabled veterans the munificent sum of $17 a month, and that is only after they have taken their homes away from them. That is the situation in a democracy under gag rule. If we could have more liberty of action in this Congress, we could do something for the people.

A friend wrote to me stating:

> Your American Congress has enacted a bill giving us fertilizer under the Muscle Shoals project. There is more fertilizer manufactured in the Congress for the common people and more interest-bearing coupons manufactured there for the banker than can possibly be conceived.

I am inclined to believe that that man had an excellent viewpoint.

Just today we received a message from the President in which he proposes that we should validate farm-loan bonds and thus make the bankers a little richer. I am going to vote for those bonds, because of and to relieve the suffering of the people, but I cannot understand why a Congress as intelligent as this one seems to be does not have the courage to vote to extend credit to the people without the medium of tax-exempt securities.

Under the bill which the President is proposing to us, you are adding to the burden of the American farmer—the tenant farmer, who is an impoverished man and who is likely to lose his home—$80,000,000 annually in unnecessary interest which will eventually revert to those in Wall Street who clip the coupons.

We have here, in these Government departments, charwomen, women performing the lowest of menial tasks, and we are cutting their low stipend 15 percent.

I personally told the President of the United States that, by his order, he was cutting the pay of hundreds of men who are receiving as low as $35 per month, after having served 30 years in the Army, men who were decorated for bravery in battle, and yet you and I and all of us, if we vote for this reduction, as it is now, are cutting the pay of these honorable men.

We are cutting the pay of the enlisted men in the service today approximately 33 percent. Do you know what happened in England when they cut the pay of the men in the navy over there? They mutinied. We cut the pay of our officers approximately 38 percent. This is all in the official record. Our lower ranking officers in the United States have had their standard of living debased. I state this from personal knowledge.

All this is being done because the Congress does not have the courage to stand on its own feet. The Members are taking dictation from other sources, and I do not know but that dictation comes from the very shadow of Wall Street; at least I believe it came from there when we enacted the Economy Act.

We have our retired men, men who were retired after 30 years of service, receiving an insignificant salary, and a number of them are bedridden. We took 15 percent away from them and at the same time we are increasing commodity prices. They write me from various places that prices are double what they have been, especially on coal and other fuel, and yet there are those here who want us to continue the salary reduction. We can and we should restore the Federal pay.

I am just presenting my viewpoint, but nevertheless I believe it will be more or less substantiated as time goes on.

Mr. Hoover lost the Presidency because of the ejection of the bonus marchers. We who are here, especially the Democratic Members of the Congress who voted for the Economy Act and those of you who vote against restoring Federal pay, are going to find when the reaction comes that it will be a juggernaut which will squash us, and there will be many men filling these seats here who are not here today. This is not a threat, but the American people are aroused, and they are not in favor of the Economy Act, notwithstanding all you may hear. I know, because I associate with them continuously, and I receive letters from all over the country. They protest when the Government, under the Economy Act, performs a function like it did in the case of a man I am going to tell you about who is a personal friend of mine. He was shot in the forehead in the Philippines and now has a silver plate in his head. He was also shot in the stomach and in the leg. He was three times wounded and then discharged for disability incurred in line of duty. They discharged him from Letterman General Hospital while he was yet ill, and 10 days afterward he collapsed on the streets of San Francisco. For 5 months he was in a charity ward of a San Francisco hospital regaining his health. Pension attorneys immediately appealed to him to apply for a pension. He refused, and for 30 years he refused to apply for any pension. In 1930 he did apply and was receiving $50 a month. Now, under the Economy Act, an act to maintain the credit of the United States—bear that in mind—they reduced this man's pension to $15 per month, an insignificant figure for a man who, at three distinct times, was wounded in action. Do you call this humane? Any man who will vote for a measure like the Economy Act, any man who understands the situation concerning Federal pay, especially of those in the lower brackets, and will vote to keep in effect the present reduction of 15 percent, I say that man's heart is as cold as granite. He is not human from my point of view.

If there are to be any adjustments in Federal pay, there ought to be a graduated scale, and individuals receiving insignificant amounts, most of whom have extra dependents relying upon them for support, should not have their pay cut to practically nothing while, at the same time, we are using every facility of Government to raise the price of commodities. This procedure is absolutely unfair and no one can stand on his feet here before me and justify it. He may try to justify it on the assumption that he must follow the administration.

Any man who comes to this Congress and does not have a mind of his own is not doing justice to himself, his office, or his constituents. A galley slave at least had the liberty of thinking; and from what I see here, some of our Congressmen decline to think; at least, if they do, they have failed to transmit their thoughts into action.

This report will come to us tomorrow and there will be a repetition of the gag rule. I thought we had all we wanted of the gag rule in the last session, but it seems it is going to be the same thing over again. In the language of the poet, "It seems the words are new, the singers too"; but it is the same thing over again—with Congress working for the interests of the bankers and not for the interests of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, a few moments ago I made an observation in regard to bringing to a vote, or rather the conclusion of this question of bonus for the soldiers. I feel more deeply on that, probably, than any other question. It is the one thing I cannot be in agreement with our President on his economy bill. Every one of you here has leaned far out over the platform on Memorial Days and paid your tribute to the soldiers, and yet when we come to a little recompense, a sort of souvenir of the war times, you refuse to get the bill out of the committee for a vote by the Members. As I suggested, it might apply to the homes in every township in North America. In the dimly lighted room where you see the flag and sword against the wall. We know what that means, and that it is the home of loyal people.

I had a visit not long ago to my own town by a southern friend. I hope that many of you may come in the same way to my beautiful university town where Bucknell is located and where you gentlemen also put a penitentiary during my absence from this Chamber. I was very much against having a penitentiary located in a town where there is a university; education and criminality do not go together. But the answer by the proponents of this method of restraint and reform was that these men sent there were gentlemen, high-toned criminals, bank robbers, bootleggers, men who stop trains in the night. You see them in that penitentiary. They are there, 1,200 of them.

When I speak of that town, I am referring to a town where there are loyal people, and to this town and my home came this man of big soul.

My friend, Mr. Ellis B. Betts, is the manager of an elevator here. He is from the heart of Georgia, 600 miles from here, deep into the South. I gave him the greatest surprise of his life, not in the classic university nor in this wonderful penitentiary, but I took him out to the cemetery. [Laughter.] I showed him something that when I was in the South with Colonel Lockwood, speaking at different places, I told this same story, and they said they believed it was untrue. I said to this southerner that all the bad blood of the Civil War was gone. I took him out to this cemetery and showed him a tombstone which was erected to the memory of Major Jordon, of the Confederate Army—the Army of Northern Virginia—and which tombstone was erected between two similar stones of soldiers of the Civil War and on the burying plot of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. FOCHT. The suggestion has been made here as to whether or not we buried the old man there. No; we did not. He is too good a man to go that way for a long time, for he has done a great deal for the North and the South by the good spirit that he daily manifests on that elevator.

Now, let us take your Democratic President. I knew him before he came here—a wonderful, genial man. I had no idea at the time that he would ever be President of the United States. I had more of an idea that I might be—perhaps an erroneous idea, it is true. But he is there, and I knew him. I believe that he is patriotic, that he has fine spirit, and that he acts with the idea of progressing when he can away from some of the old methods of doing things. So far as his wisdom is concerned, of course, you have to prove that in the operation of his legislative conceptions.

You cannot tell what will be the result of anything that you do here, even with the collective genius and wisdom of this whole crowd, because when you put into operation the wonderful legislation that you passed here and that was pronounced to be perfect, legislation that was going to wipe away all the tears—after you have had that legislation in operation for a short time, it comes in contact with the laws of nature, and there is where the errors are unfolded; and you will have to bring back all the legislation that was passed here for amendment and correction. There were 16 bills passed here, major pieces of legislation. Every one of them will have to be corrected, and we will have to be patient about it, because, unfortunately, you have tried them out for only a short time and yet have found errors in every one of them. You passed legislation in 40 days that ought to have taken about 30 years.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should be glad to have the gentleman tell us how he is going to get the soldiers' bonus legislation out.

Mr. FOCHT. I told you that I would come to the beginning of my address sometime later.

Mr. McFARLANE. But the gentleman is about to run out of time.

Mr. FOCHT. But not out of conversation. What did you want me to tell you about?

Mr. WOODRUM. Tell us how the gentleman is going to get the bonus bill out.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, I am going to tell you why you will not get it out, although you can. I know something of the ways of legislation here. I learned that the first time that I came into a caucus, when probably the greatest parliamentarian on this hill, at least the fastest worker, was James Sherman, later Vice President of the United States. In the caucus I undertook to make a speech or to address the Chair, and he ordered me to my seat. He finally told me that if I had been here in the room when the meeting was opened I would have learned that the rules were adopted that there was to be no debate or amendment; so I took my seat. That is the first thing that I knew about parliamentary practice that was not practiced in the Pennsylvania Legislature. Several other times when Mr. Gillett was Speaker I had reason to believe that I could get recognition from him in the last 5 days of the session, but every time I got up he would say, "I very much regret that I cannot recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania for that purpose." In other words, sit down! They talk about Joe Cannon or Champ Clark or any Speaker or anyone who undertook to arrogate the power and concentrate it in the hands of one man—and that is where it finally gets, does it not? When you wind up this session, there is one man who is the supreme power in this country, and he is the Speaker of the House of Representatives. We all know that this Committee on Rules was created to break up that power, but it is really more potential than ever, particularly with a majority like this, consolidated around the Presidency, just starting to operate, a new administration with all the appointments, all the big things, all the great legislation to originate. So we have this Committee on Rules. That was debated, discussed by all the "brain trusts" long before the present "brain trust" was ever heard of and by all the magazines of the country—all about this concentration of power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman give me some more time?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, 15 minutes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Very well.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not get up very often. You understand that I know the power of this committee. I know that on occasions members of the Rules Committee did not even meet. I am pretty certain this is what happened right on the floor. They went around and got the consent or an agreement of a majority of the members that a certain bill was to be brought out at a certain time on the floor of this House. That resolution was adopted by the House, and that resolution took away the highest privilege of parliamentary procedure, namely, debate and amendment. A bill had to come out at a certain time without debate or amendment. Talk about autocratic powers! There is where this bonus bill is slumbering, but for a time only I hope.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman tell us who was in charge of the Rules Committee at the time to which he refers?

Mr. FOCHT. I could not do that except in the way I have. It was not the gentleman, for you would not do it in that way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. You might be surprised tomorrow when we bring in this rule.

Mr. FOCHT. I should like to see you or some Democrat, if it must be, take hold of this bonus question and heartily respond to the wish of the people and enact it along with other legislation for the soldiers and their dependents.

When I was here 10 years ago, I voted several times for that bonus bill. During my 10 years of absence I have read constantly about the bonus and why they do not get it, and the power is here to give it to them. As I said, I believe that you all believe that they ought to have it, but the alibi is that we do not have the money. When we see what has been appropriated, getting up into billions of dollars, that is a small amount. I talked with Secretary Cordell Hull. We lived at the same hotel down here, and he agreed with me that we needed a protective tariff, but he said, "Your $600,000,000 is all you can raise from the tariff. That will not be sufficient to run this Government. We have to get it some other way." As you know, Mr. Hull proceeded to reintroduce his legislation putting on the income tax. It was finally declared constitutional. So they get the money in that way. Just think of it, my friends. At that time, sitting down there in front of the Corcoran Hotel, where he and I lived, he said, "Just look at it. Here is the first time in your life or mine when we have been called upon to appropriate a billion dollars to run the Government."

I once heard a fellow say up in Harrisburg, "Who cares for a million dollars?" And he never came back to the Legislature again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. With great pleasure. I have just been reading the History of the Texas Republic, the gentleman's home State.

Mr. BLANTON. I was wondering whether the gentleman had forgotten a dozen years ago when he was somewhat of a dictator himself?

Mr. FOCHT. Well, why not now?

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman spoke in terms of millions of dollars, when he made his famous banquet speech, and said that with him the Treasury doors were wide open and the blue sky was the limit on what he was going to give the District of Columbia, and as soon as he went home we did not see any more of him for 12 years.

Mr. FOCHT. That is the reason you are seeing me now. If I had stayed here perhaps I would not be here now, because when I came back there were about 35 who had not disappeared, and I might have been one of them.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just remembering what the gentleman said about my district. He called it a jack-rabbit district.

Mr. FOCHT. Well, I guess it is yet, is it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. But it has been here operating all the time the gentleman has been in Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I see the gentleman from Texas has subsided somewhat. I do not know what is the occasion, or who has been after him since I have been gone, but we always got along and we are going to get along. Now, just to show you how a misconstruction might be placed upon some innocent statement. I did go to a banquet out here. I was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia at that time. I said to Mr. Wardman, "What do you want me here for? What do you want me to do?" He said, "Build us a city." "All right", I said. Unfortunately for BLANTON, he takes some things too seriously. I know what is in his mind. It would go better today than it did at that time, although I think that was before prohibition. Anyway, his idea is that these extravagant pictures that I painted, of the fluted columns and the wonderful architecture of Nineveh and Greece and Rome that would all be surpassed when I got through building this city for Harry Wardman would cost too much money. Instead of that city being built, Harry Wardman got into financial difficulties, and I got licked for Congress. But he is still living and going to come back, and I have arrived. But to show you what occurs, my friends, I did say, I think, when I spoke in terms of dollars, that it might cost fifty or a hundred million dollars to beautify this great city.

Someone asked a man how he liked New York. He said, "I think I shall like it pretty well after they finish it." So that will be the way with this city after they finish it. What has happened? Instead of a hundred million—just see how extravagant ideas grow from that night out at the Wardman Park Hotel. Instead of a hundred million dollars, they took my plan and laid out a program of a billion dollars, and they are working on it today, and there is no difficulty and no one offering any complaint even in this great depression. Let it go. Let us make it a great city. It is our city. There has been a lot of conversation about laying out avenues and places to put automobiles. If they had carried out the plan we had then, you would have had a place for automobiles long, long ago. We were going to dig out the whole Mall down here and make a place for a garage. It would not be congested for 5 miles. Elevated railroads, underground railroads; no beer gardens or anything like that, because they had enough in those alleys, but thank the Lord I helped clean them up, too. They were not desirable anywhere. I was called wet because I was not a radical dry. So that is the way I got my position understood.

Mr. McFARLANE. The Cherokee strip.

Mr. FOCHT. The Cherokee strip. Now, there is only one way to accomplish this program, of course, and that would be by an appeal to the conscience, the judgment, and the patriotism and fairness to these soldiers.

How impotent a minority is! It may be wonderfully aggressive and accomplish great results with a passive majority, but it does not seem that that is going to happen during this session or possibly another session; it may, however, if you resist the popular demand for the justice due these soldiers, the honor, mercy, pity, and compassion you owe them and ought to have for the children, the wives, and mothers. This thing has impressed me very emphatically since my return a few weeks ago to find these many appeals. I do hope that while you are talking about the farmer—we are all for him, we are all for everybody, we want prosperity to come back—you will not forget the veterans. I voted with the President. I voted with him because my patriotism ran way beyond any partisanship. Surely the patriotism and lack of partisanship of the North is manifested when we see laid away side by side one man wearing the blue and the other man wearing the gray. There is no spirit of partisanship in the North and there ought not to be between the parties. You have the advantage—you have the control of this Government. But a responsibility has been thrust upon you in this matter. The appeal does not come from any particular section; it comes from all parts of this country; it comes from the depths of the souls of the American people. I cannot help but feel that if Mr. Roosevelt understood this he would modify the provisions of the Economy Act affecting the veterans.

I sometimes doubt whether the man who becomes President really receives the impulse and expression of the will of the people. Somehow, the man who becomes President seems to have too little time to understand these things; his vision runs off into economic questions and not to the care of these soldiers.

During the last session of Congress I voted with your President as I voted repeatedly with President Wilson.

I think in all probability President Wilson delivered to the world the greatest hope any man ever held out for the abandonment of war as a method of settling differences. He ceased to believe with the cave man that you should strip your raiment from the leopard and get direct results with the knife. Woodrow Wilson wanted to resort to peaceful methods of settling disputes. But they lied to him over there, and they cheated him. In turn, Congress was cheated. Who in the world would have voted to send the American Army over to Europe after what George Washington said on the subject and after what Monroe said on the subject? It would not have been done had they not told President Wilson that in the treaty of peace there would be incorporated a doctrine that should live forever; that is, that there should be no conquest, that there should be no victory. Yet, Mr. Chairman, think what happened in the treaty of peace! That sickened President Wilson; it broke his heart and he came home and died.

Mr. Chairman, I believe our present President has the proper impulse, the proper spirit of patriotism, the best understanding possible of humanity, but I do not believe there has been a free flow up to him of the sentiment on that bill, the first one passed at the last session of Congress, the one we called the "economy bill."

The veterans must be taken care of. They are public spirited. They have taken the hazard. I will agree with you on almost anything else relating to this question, but we must take care of the veterans. [Applause.]

It was courageous, but none have yet said it was wise or helpful to the country in our present plight for President Roosevelt to have gone to the Chicago American Legion Convention to tell the soldiers that because they wore a uniform is no reason why they should be considered over a citizen who did not serve as a soldier.

Right here is where the President breaks with the opinion of men throughout all history. He would assume an attitude toward the men who take the hazard that is a contradiction of all nationalism from the pagan days of Alexander, who sent his sick and exhausted soldiers back to Macedonia with orders for their reward; Napoleon, when confined on the barren rock of St. Helena, and just before he died, willed millions to his soldiers of the empire, although he did not have a franc. The French Government made good every bequest.

England and every other civilized nation knights and bestows fortunes upon her soldiers. And to soldiers we might add firemen and policemen—men who take the hazard for all men and women and our families, men who stand between attack upon our liberty and homes and enemy attack of soldiers; and the firemen who are on guard day and night to save property and rescue lives at the risk of their own. The police officers and guards in our penal institutions have a constantly increasing risk hanging over them.

That these men, in the estimation of the President, are not to be differently considered or set apart from other men whom they have protected and saved, as well as glorified as nationals, is where we are afraid the President has gone far afield in his effort to find agreement with the popular mind.

A contradictory previous judgment was rendered when the law was made that now gives the soldier a 5-percent preference in all civil-service examinations.

The President spoke of two principles he would have the members of the Legion contemplate and accept. We quote the following from his speech delivered in Chicago on Monday:

> The first principle, following inevitably from the obligation of citizens to bear arms, is that the Government has a responsibility for and toward those who suffered injury or contracted disease while serving in its defense.
>
> The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform, must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated and not connected with that service.
> It does mean, however, that those who were injured in or as a result of their service are entitled to receive adequate and generous compensation for their disabilities. It does mean that generous care shall be extended to the dependents of those who died in or as a result of service to their country.
> To carry out these principles, the people of this country can and will pay in taxes the sums which it is necessary to raise. To carry out these principles will not bankrupt your Government nor throw its bookkeeping into the red.

Here is a vast change in Presidential dictum since Lincoln fell the victim of an assassin's bullet. The great man repeatedly said what would be done for those who saved the Union. And it was done, for finally every soldier and soldier's widow received Government pension regardless of wounds or disabilities service connected.

The President need not live long to see quite the opposite to his second point set forth in the above quotation from his speech put into action just as previous Presidents of this country sanctioned pensions not only for the wounded soldier but the needy ones as well, and out of the Government revenues, for the soldiers in all of our 19 wars fought for the flag of our country and what it symbolizes, and not merely for a State.

Everybody will stand by the President in his drive to bring the country back to prosperity, and suffer to do it, just as they fought for peace and democracy, but which are hard to find, at least in Europe.

But when we are asked to concur in the sentiment that a man who took or is willing to take the great chance for his country, or a community or individual, whether he be soldier, fireman, or policeman, is not to have special regard or consideration above other men, the President is going to be lonesome in attempting to rally any measure of concurrence. It would be a contradiction of every element of human nature as impressed and nurtured by the tragedies of advancing civilization under banners and the cross. Chivalry and gratitude will have to die, and the flag lose its meaning, before rich, proud America will deny after a war what was promised before the conflict, for we have the desire and money to do it. If we do not have the money, that might be a reason for temporarily withholding help, but there can be few who will agree that the man who assumes your peril does not stand apart and deserve special consideration.

In contrast it should be noted how America poured out billions to the ungrateful nations of Europe and cannot take care of our own soldiers! But we can, and will.

The President has said he expects to make mistakes but would correct them.

We hope he may make many corrections in his economy bill, and in this latest declaration which cannot stand against the traditions of antiquity and the ready acceptance by every President of the past and the people of today.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is my duty to call the attention of Congress to a condition that has existed in one of the divisions of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, as an example of what may be happening in many other branches of the various emergency agencies set up within recent months for the purpose of extending relief to citizens of the United States.

In securing personnel for the many emergency organizations, the usual civil-service requirements are not insisted upon, to the end that personnel officers, and in many instances chiefs of divisions, have the authority to secure personnel and place them on the rolls in any manner they desire, despite the fact that Congress has provided employment agencies to furnish such help without charge.

Despite this provision, and the fact that every Member of this House is contacted daily by many men and women seeking employment, having qualifications for almost any position from file clerk to scientist, I have discovered, through the assistance of one of the victims, that the services of a private employment agency, located in Washington, has been used in securing personnel by one of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation divisions.

In this particular case, the employee, then unemployed, registered with the Washington Business Bureau, an employment agency located in the Bond Building, Washington, D.C., paid the customary registration fee, and then in company with several other registrants, was sent to the chief of one of the divisions of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, who placed them on the pay roll as typists. Upon the receipt of their pay they are required to remit a percentage of same to the Washington Business Bureau as compensation for having been given employment.

Needless to say, when this matter was called to my attention I was inclined to doubt the story; however, the matter was placed in writing by one of my constituents now located in Washington, with the request that it be investigated.

I first contacted the Better Business Bureau, to determine the character of the Washington Business Bureau, and found that it had been the subject for investigation a few months ago for certain practices which were of such seriousness as to be called to the attention of the district attorney's office. The bureau is operated by John D. Kendall, a resident of the District. Mr. Kendall could not be contacted at his office, but was located by telephone at his residence. He admitted having furnished help for the division of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, saying he was called by a Mr. Downes to do so. He admitted having collected a registration fee from the persons selected for the assignment, and the further collection of a percentage of their salaries since they have been employed.

Mr. Downes, who holds a supervisory position in one of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation divisions, when contacted by phone, admitted having secured employees through the assistance of Mr. Kendall, but denied having any knowledge that Mr. Kendall operated an employment agency at that time. He stated that it was necessary to secure personnel in a hurry, and that he was unable to get it through the regular channels provided by Congress. Mr. Downes denied having any knowledge of the employees having to pay the Washington Business Bureau, until the first pay day, at which time the matter was brought to his attention. He says he endeavored to contact Mr. Kendall immediately in an effort to release the clerks from further payment, but was unable to locate him, until I called him yesterday, January 9, 1934.

All of the facts have been transmitted to the Chairman of the Home Loan Bank Board, with the request that the matter be thoroughly investigated by the proper authorities and that the persons responsible for the exposure be protected in their positions.

I appreciate the impossibility for the heads of these large emergency agencies to keep their fingers on every detail of activity in their organization, and realize they must of necessity rely on their many assistants to carry on.

It is quite evident however, that under the present methods of securing personnel, there is opportunity for petty graft and victimizing of unemployed persons securing positions in the Government service. Certainly in the administration of the great emergency program having for its basic purpose the relief of unemployed, Congress should not countenance a condition that puts Government employment on the auction block.

I do not contend that this condition prevails generally, I hope this is an isolated case, but the fact remains that unless personnel officers are required to fill positions through proper channels such as the Civil Service Commission or the Federal employment offices, either by Executive order or act of Congress, we will find chiseling has become a racket in the governmental service just as it is operating between contractors and employees on Federal building projects.

It is time we place some safeguards about the huge expenditures being made for recovery, and subject emergency activities to the same restrictions and regulations, that experience has warranted in the past.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I think this afternoon all of the Members have been intensely interested in the speeches which have been made from the floor. I think, too, that I can agree with most of the Members in what they said. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] was not referring to me, however, when he criticized those gentlemen who had not supported the veterans' legislation; nor was the gentleman from North Dakota referring to me when he mentioned those who had not signed the petition to discharge the committee from consideration of the Frazier bill. I signed the petition last session to discharge the committee from consideration of that bill. This fall I made 20 stump speeches at organization meetings of the Farmers' National Union in my State. Let me inform the gentleman from North Dakota that again I will sign his petition to bring out the Frazier bill. Not only will I sign his petition, but I will use every effort at my command to follow the message of the President of the United States read here today, in which he asked this Congress to guarantee the principal as well as the interest of the $2,000,000,000 of Federal Farm Land Bank loans.

I wonder if all of us realize that every day we spend in this Chamber 3,000 farmers and home owners in this country are having their life savings legally stolen by the money lenders of this country? All of us thought in the last session of Congress that we had at least temporarily alleviated the misery and suffering of these people, but in my own State, the State of Ohio, last month, there were some 800 foreclosures and confiscations of property.

I cannot agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] when he said that the Farm Credit Corporation is functioning well. It may be functioning well in his State, but it is not in my State. I want to give you just two or three tabulations, official tabulations from the Federal Land Bank of Louisville, Ky., which were given out on January 5 of this year.

During the year 1933, 15,834 applications were received from the State of Ohio. Up to the present time there have been actually loaned in the State of Ohio, with drafts paid, 1,331 loans, totaling $4,999,000, and 735 commissioner's loans, totaling $952,000. The total amount of loans requested in the applications on file to date amount to $58,000,000.

Think of this staggering comparison. Only a little over $5,000,000 actually loaned and $58,000,000 requested to be loaned. There have been more rejections of applications to date than the actual drafts that have gone forth to lift mortgages.

Mr. Chairman, I say to you this: I agree with the gentlemen who have expressed a desire to restore in full the Federal pay cut of Federal employees. I am in full sympathy with any and all efforts that will be made to restore the compensation cuts of Spanish-American War veterans and of service-connected disability cases of World War veterans, and, in fact, I am introducing bills to cover this feature.

I agree with what has been said about the Economy Act. Mr. Chairman, if the Economy Act has slain its thousands, the administration of that act has slain its tens of thousands, and the sooner that mistake is rectified that much better will this great country of ours be.

Mention has been made that elevator operators only receive $85 a month, and it is true, and it is a low salary, and I will vote to correct it; yet I can produce for you 1,000,000 farmers in Ohio who, if you will take their farms, will gladly work for $85 a month.

I care not what statements are issued from the Department of Agriculture. When they tell me they are pouring millions of dollars into my State as they have done, I say to them the answer is 2½-cent hogs; the answer is 3½-cent cattle; the answer is 7-cent poultry; 10 cents a pound butter fat; and I am speaking of the farmers of the great Corn Belt. I am not referring to the southern planters, because they have been vastly helped. I am not referring to the tobacco growers, but I am referring to the great Corn Belt, the boundary of which begins in my State and stretches on toward the Pacific coast, and in these States the raisers of hogs and of cattle, the dairymen, the poultrymen, are in the worst condition they have ever been since the beginning of the history of this great country of ours.

Three thousand homes and farms are being foreclosed every day. Have we done our duty to these poor unfortunates, whose throats have been cut from ear to ear and whose blood gushes forth every day at the feet of the Shylocks and the money lenders of this country. I say we have not done our duty.

On April 27 last I introduced a bill that provided for a national moratorium against foreclosure. This bill was passed upon by a number of constitutional lawyers.

I again remind you that the Congress of the United States has plenary power over the bankruptcy law. This bill of mine provides that whenever a landowner cannot pay his taxes or his interest or a portion of the principal which constitutes a default thereof, he becomes a bankrupt for the purposes of this act, and no creditor can proceed against him for a period of 1 year, until he can refinance his holdings, either through the Farm Loan Act or the Home Loan Act of 1933.

I may say to the gentlemen who have petitions lying on the Speaker's desk that I expect to have a petition there soon which will ask to discharge the committee from consideration of this bill so that it may be given consideration in the House and action taken on the measure here, and I ask you gentlemen to support this bill the same as I shall support your bills.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Certainly.

Mr. KVALE. Does the gentleman's measure apply also to indebtedness to the United States Government?

Mr. TRUAX. My measure applies to any landowner or owner of real estate who is about to be foreclosed because of nonpayment of taxes, interest, or principal.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman did not understand my question. Does the bill apply to indebtedness which the landowner may owe to the United States Governemnt?

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman means Federal Land Bank loans?

Mr. KVALE. Land-bank loans, seed loans, feed loans, it matters not.

Mr. TRUAX. My measure applies only to real estate, but I think it could be amended to cover all the indebtedness that the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read a portion of a letter which I received this morning.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCFARLANE). Without objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. TRUAX. They tell you that the Federal land bank is functioning. Here is a letter which relates to a neighbor of mine, a man whose farm adjoins my farm, and this is his attorney writing the letter:

I am writing you in behalf of Mr. Blank, who is well acquainted with you and the facts of which you can attest. He has applied for a Federal farm loan and needs very little more than $4,000 for his 160 acres, the quality of which you know. It is an excellent farm, in bad repair. It is certainly worth far more, however, than the little he needs to save it. The money lender has a $2,500 mortgage at 8 percent interest and has started foreclosure and I have held it off for 2 or 3 months, but cannot do so any longer. The judge, today, postponed the order of foreclosure for 10 days when advertising will start.

J. O. had a hard time getting a secretary to accept his money and make application, but he finally did about 2 weeks ago. So you see, he has not much time. Knowing the old gentleman as you do, I was hoping you would give this matter your personal attention and see that Mr. Blank is given the attention he deserves and assist him in getting this loan. It certainly would be a shame and disgrace to permit the mortgagee to get this farm for his small mortgage. He is using every effort to discourage a loan and wants the farm badly.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to call attention to the Minnesota law which, in a case like that, would extend the time in such a mortgage matter until May 1, 1935, within which time he would have an opportunity to refinance. Would not that meet the situation in the gentleman's State?

Mr. TRUAX. That would not cover the situation in my State. We have a moratorium law. The Governor, George White, was goaded into asking the legislature to pass a moratorium law, but the law that they passed stipulated that the man must have his interest and his taxes paid before the law becomes operative. Of course, that is absolutely useless, because if a man is able to pay his interest and taxes, the mortgagee will extend his time.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. FOSS. Does not the gentleman think that the fault can be laid directly to the door of the appraisers?

Mr. TRUAX. I would say that the blame must originally be laid to the door of A. M. Cardon, son-in-law of Reed Smoot, and also to the doors of Thomas E. Neeley, reviewing appraiser, and B. G. De Weese, assistant reviewing appraiser at Louisville, and John S. Beard, supervising appraiser for Ohio. I would state to the gentleman that I filed a report with the President of the United States on December 9, and those gentlemen have been removed or demoted.

Mr. FOSS. And the blame can be brought back to the doors of these appraisers.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman is right. At the time my report was filed there were 186 appraisers. There were only about 15 actual, honest-to-God farmers in the whole list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. TRUAX. It is a fact, and I have affidavits to support my charges, that some thirty-odd nonfarming occupation persons were selected as appraisers. It seemed as though every banker whose bank had closed up was sure to get a job as an appraiser. Then next came ex-county agents. Then we had insurance salesmen and ex-real estate men. We had automobile salesmen, oil salesmen. We had one man who was selling iceless refrigerators. I suppose he thought he could cool the farmers' wrath and troubles. We had 30 nonfarming occupations represented as appraisers. I said at one time that the only nonfarm occupations who failed to get jobs as appraiser was the barbers, but I found that I was mistaken. I afterwards found there were two barbers working as appraisers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman states that the fault is with the appraisers. Should not the blame be placed upon Congress for permitting loans on 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the value of the building? Does the gentleman think Congress should have passed that kind of a bill?

Mr. TRUAX. In answer to the gentleman I will say that whenever it became necessary because of the inexperience of the appraisers because of their youth and general disqualifications—whenever it became necessary to send these fellows out with augers 5 or 6 feet long to bore into the soil to determine what the land was worth. This proved conclusively that it was futile to expect fair and reasonable appraisals from a white-collar, soil-boring army of misfits.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I will.

Mr. DUNN. How many of these farmers have lost their farms?

Mr. TRUAX. I cannot give the gentleman the number, but there were 2,000 every day.

Mr. DUNN. In the State of Ohio?

Mr. TRUAX. In the entire country. I want to say that some of the larger insurance companies who signed the agreement or made a verbal agreement with the President of the United States that they would withhold foreclosures have been the most ruthless of all in the past 3 months. [Applause.]

In our State we are also confronted with the evil menace of a so-called "State superintendent of banks", Mr. Ira G. Fulton, who is liquidating some 250 State banks in our State, among them the Union Trust Co. of Cleveland and the Guardian Trust & Savings, two of the biggest bank failures in the country. It has been the policy of Mr. Fulton under the Governor to ruthlessly foreclose when all other agencies have ceased. I recall one instance of a captain in the World War, a resident of my former home town of Sycamore, who was shell shocked. His four companions were killed instantly. This man came back from the war proud and erect, but in a few years this great shock began to tell on him. Today he is a physical wreck. He was drawing a pension of $148 per month, and that was completely emasculated on July 1 under the Economy Act. Within about 60 days later this captain of the World War, this hero, owed the Sycamore State Bank $1,500 and some interest, on which he had given his mortgage note which was past due. Ira Fulton, the State banking superintendent, sold him out. He did not sell him out, he stole his home legally, because there were no debts upon it, and Fulton bid it in in the name of the great State of Ohio. This war captain is now living in Toledo with his children.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] has made some remarks, and I am glad to hear that there is one State in the Union where the Farm Credit Corporation is functioning well. If I mistake not, I have another letter here which I shall ask permission to read. This letter was received this morning:

> DEAR SIR: Since I read in the Toledo Blade of your investigation of the Louisville land bank, I want to write and tell you that the intermediate credit bank there needs a shaking up also. I have one of their chattel loans made through Mr. Dunipace, of Bowling Green, Ohio. They require the interest paid in advance, and threaten foreclosure when the farmers get behind with payments. They are trying to get me to turn over my milk cows on my Louisville loan. I appreciate what you are doing, and assure you the farmers are watching your efforts. Why cannot these loans be handled by the farmers instead of the bankers?

Those are only typical of the hundreds of letters I have received since the investigation was started last summer. I say to you that this country stands today on the brink of a revolution. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] yesterday read a telegram that Chicago was without milk. Why is that so? It is because in many sections the farmers are receiving only 60 cents a hundred pounds for their milk, which is less than 1 cent a quart. In my section farmers are receiving as low as 80 cents a hundred pounds for their milk—and then you wonder why they rebel and revolt. Had not the American farmer been the most patient, the most tolerant individual on the face of the earth you would have had a revolution in this country years ago. We frequently hear or read of a recital of that first verse in Edward Markham's poem The Man with the Hoe, but did you ever read the last verse of that poem? Here is the way it goes:

> O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
> How will the Future reckon with this Man?
> How answer his brute question in that hour
> When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
> How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
> With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
> When this dumb Terror shall reply to God,
> After the silence of the centuries?

We need not go to Europe to find the peasant farmer. The farmers of Germany today are receiving $1.50 a bushel for their wheat, and the French farmer is getting $1.70 for his. The only progress that we have made is from an average of 47 cents in 1932 to an average of around 80 cents in 1933. These fellows down at the Department of Agriculture say that you cannot fix farm prices, yet the only success that they have had in the A.A.A. is where they have actually fixed prices by lending money on certain crops and commodities—cotton around 10 cents a pound, corn at 45 cents a bushel, and so on. In my State there are not 10 counties where we sell corn. We feed it into livestock, into hogs, and cattle, and poultry. This policy that is being urged on the farmers of the country today is the most fallacious and destructive of all times. They tell the farmer to lock up his corn, to sell it and get rid of his livestock, when every son of the soil knows that one of his major efforts must be to maintain and conserve the fertility of his soil by feeding his corn into his livestock.

My friends, let me say before I conclude that I have been a farmer all my life. My family for generations back have been farmers. They know nothing else. On the mantel in my home is an old grandfather's clock that ticked on the farm of one of my ancesters 140 years ago. It ticks today in my home. I say to you that now it ticks at the zero hour for this great American agriculture of ours, supreme in all the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, there have been several requests for time, but the gentlemen who requested it are not present. My colleague advises me there are no further requests on that side, so I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill, had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the "Moratorium Case", a mortgage case from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Reserving the right to object, that matter has already been entered in the RECORD by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] this afternoon.

Mr. McKEOWN. Very well. In that case I will withdraw my request.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in committee on the St. Lawrence waterway.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SUTPHIN, for an indefinite period, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 11, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

275. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting herewith the cost ascertainment report for the fiscal year 1933; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

276. A letter from Hamilton and Hamilton, transmitting copy of the annual report of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railway Co. for the year ended December 31, 1933; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. WOODRUM: Committee on Appropriations. H.R. 6663. A bill making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 277). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. POU: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 217. SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, to whose all-searching sight the darkness shineth as the light, bless us with the vision of Thyself, without which man is no longer man; for all that thought can grasp or eye perceive is but a shadow of Thy power, which hath created and upholdest all.

In the joy of Thy strength may we work without haste, without sloth, and, being faithful to the past, to eternal truth and beauty, may we, as watchers for the dawn, look for the unseen day when the city of God shall rise in splendor in our midst. And since before Thee all our hearts are bare, and not even the shadow of a thought can rise without Thy knowledge, do Thou guard each tempted heart and keep it pure from each unholy wish, that we may treasure only thoughts of Thee to guide us in our work through all the cloudy days that lie ahead.

Accept our prayer, the incense of the soul, and hallow it with Thy perfecting grace; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, when, on request of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

TAXATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill H.R. 6131, the so-called "liquor tax bill", was ordered to a third reading and passed on yesterday. I desire to say that as soon as morning business shall have been concluded I will make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Frank J. Pexa, of Lonsdale, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called "Frazier bill", providing for the refinancing of farm mortgages, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WALSH presented a petition of 100 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the so-called "Hatfield-Keller railroad retirement bill", being the bill (S. 817) to provide for a retirement system for railroad and transportation employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a memorial numerously signed by sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called "Prince plan" for the consolidation of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. as tending to lessen employment, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented the following memorial of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

House Memorial 1

To the honorable Senators and Representatives from Arkansas in the United States Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the House of Representatives of the State of Arkansas, being assembled in an extraordinary session of the forty-ninth general assembly, most respectfully memorialize and petition you as follows:

Whereas the United States Government is spending vast sums of money to provide employment; and

Whereas it behooves all of us in working for the Nation's recovery to work for the greatest good for the greatest number; and

Whereas by reason of the regulations under which money is being spent by the United States Government for the purpose of relieving the unemployment situation many persons are furnished steady employment while others receive none at all; and

Whereas this situation leads not only to the necessity for direct relief but to a condition of unrest among the people so affected:

Therefore we, the members of the House of Representatives of the State of Arkansas, respectfully petition you, collectively and individually, to use your influence to have the regulations aforesaid changed in such manner as will more equitably distribute the employment provided for; be it

Resolved, That the chief clerk of this body be, and he is hereby, directed to forward at once copies of this memorial to each Member of the National Congress from Arkansas at Washington, D.C.

STATE OF ARKANSAS,
County of Pulaski:

I, James R. Campbell, chief clerk of the House of Representatives of the State of Arkansas, hereby certify that the foregoing House Memorial 1 was duly adopted by the house of representatives at the extraordinary session of 1934 and is a true and compared copy of same.

JAMES R. CAMPBELL,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. CAREY presented the following joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of enrolled Joint Memorial No. 1, house of representatives of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming, being original house Joint Memorial No. 1, approved by the Governor on December 16, 1933, at 4:55 p.m.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 3d day of January, A.D. 1934.

A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.
By C. J. ROGERS,
Deputy.

Enrolled Joint Memorial 1, House of Representatives, Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact legislation prohibiting or curtailing the importation of canned beef

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows: That—

Whereas there is at this time an average monthly importation of South American canned beef to the amount of over 4,000,000 pounds, and this canned beef is sold throughout the United States to the detriment of the market for American-grown beef; and

Whereas the beef industry, Wyoming's largest industry, is suffering from this competition; and

Whereas the price of beef cattle produced in Wyoming is below the cost of production: Now, therefore, be it hereby

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the President and the Congress of the United States of America to pass an act prohibiting further importation of canned beef; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this concurred memorial be forwarded to the Wyoming Senators and the Wyoming Representative in the Congress of the United States of America.

OSCAR BECK,
President of the Senate.
WM. M. JACK,
Speaker of the House.

Approved 4:55 p.m. December 16, 1933.

LESLIE A. MILLER, Governor.

Whereas there is now pending from Wyoming before the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works an application of the French Creek Irrigation Co., of Johnson County, for the sum of $100,000 for the construction of a reservoir and ditch; of the Greybull Valley irrigation district, of Big Horn County, for the sum of $968,000 for the construction of a reservoir and dam; of the Bear River Water Users' Association of Uinta County the sum of $433,800 for the construction of a reservoir; of the Rock Creek, Piney Reservoir & Ditch Co., of Johnson County, the sum of $60,000 for construction of a reservoir; and of Clear Creek irrigation district, of Johnson County, for the sum of $106,600 for construction of a reservoir; and for the construction of the Bull Lake Reservoir in Fremont County the sum of $400,000; and

Whereas these projects have been approved by the State advisory board and State administration for allocation and loan; and

Whereas a formal application has been made to the State advisory board and State administration on the part of the North Piney irrigation district in Sublette County for the sum of $80,000; by the settlers' irrigation district of Lincoln County for the sum of $100,000; and for the Owl Creek Reservoir, of Hot Springs County, for the sum of $360,000; and

Whereas there are seven additional applications to the State advisory board and State administration in course of preparation asking allocations for irrigation purposes in the total amount of $555,000; and

Whereas these applications are in almost every instance for the purpose of securing a supplemental supply of water for lands now under irrigation by the impounding of flood waters; and

Whereas the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has in the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, Montana, and other States allocated funds for public works in addition to those allocated for the major project therein; and

Whereas there has been allocated by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works $22,700,000 for the construction of the Casper-Alcova project in Wyoming; and

Whereas the funds asked to be allocated for projects in Wyoming other than those allocated for the Casper-Alcova project are less than $2,500,000; and

Whereas there has been allocated in the State of Washington, in addition to $63,000,000 for the Grand Coulee project, an additional $1,000,000 for other work; in the State of Oregon, in addition to $20,500,000 for the Bonneville Dam, over $7,500,000 for other projects; in the States of California and Oregon, in addition to $38,000,000 for the Boulder Dam, over $48,000,000 for other projects; in the State of Montana, in addition to $15,500,000 for the Fort Peck Dam, over $1,000,000 for other purposes; in the State of Tennessee, in addition to $50,000,000 for one project, a sum of over $2,000,000 for other purposes; while in the State of Wyoming, in addition to $22,500,000 for the Casper-Alcova project, there has been allocated to Wyoming only $20,000 for other purposes: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That we impress upon the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works the great necessity of funds for these projects and the urgent need of a sufficient supply of water to properly irrigate the lands within these projects, which can only be secured by the impounding of the flood waters of our streams, that we call upon the State officials and State advisory board and State administration to use every effort on their part to secure the allocation of additional funds sufficient to provide for these projects; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to His Excellency, the President of the United States, to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, to the State advisory board and State administration, and to each of our Representatives in the National Congress.

President of the Senate.

Speaker of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to relief for the dairy industry

Whereas over $350,000,000 will be spent in corn and hog bonuses and approximately the same amount in wheat and cotton bonuses; and

Whereas Wisconsin will receive but $7,000,000 of this amount; and

Whereas there appears to be no relief in sight for the dairy industry; and

Whereas, if the dairy industry was to receive treatment on the same basis as the wheat, cotton, and corn industries, Wisconsin would be receiving approximately $65,000,000 instead of $7,000,000; and

Whereas the dairy industry is in a serious condition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Department of Agriculture, or its Agricultural Adjustment Administration, take vigorous measures to initiate a program along the following lines:

1. A production-control program that will bring dairy production somewhere nearly into line with effective consumer demand.

2. In connection with this basic program, a supplementary program that will tend to take existing surpluses of dairy products off the market and increase the price of dairy products to whatever extent effective consumer demand will permit.

3. A subsidiary program to check the imports of so-called "manufactured" cream, vegetable oils, and casein, and an adequate internal tax on all butter substitutes.

Resolved further, That suitable copies of this resolution be forwarded to Hon. Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D.C., to both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to temporarily reduce or cancel the fees payable under the naturalization laws

Whereas many persons in Wisconsin, as well as in other States, who desire to become citizens of the United States, are unable to take the necessary steps for naturalization at this time because of inability to pay the fees and expenses prescribed by the naturalization laws; and

Whereas there are a large number of cases where declarations of intention have already been filed and the prescribed periods of validity for filing petitions for citizenship will have expired before recovery from unemployment, and many cases of persons unable to pay the required fees and expenses for filing a declaration of intention; and

Whereas the policy of the Federal and State Governments generally to relax, modify, or suspend normal requirements in favor of persons handicapped in the present economic emergency should be applied at least temporarily to those seeking naturalization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature respectfully memoralizes the Congress of the United States to amend the naturalization laws by reducing or canceling all naturalization fees and expenses until July 1, 1935, so that persons who are otherwise qualified but who, under the present economic conditions, are unable to pay the prescribed fees and expenses, may proceed with naturalization; also to so extend any prescribed periods of validity which have expired since July 1, 1933, that no naturalization rights will be lost or delayed since said date; be it further

Resolved, That suitably attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to each Member of Congress from this State.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to recognize the Federal Government's obligation to share equitably the proceeds of liquor taxes with the States, counties, and cities, and to prevent intergovernmental competition in the field of liquor taxation through the adoption of the recommendations presented by the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation with the authority of the interstate assembly.

Whereas there is grave danger that the anticipated benefits of repeal will be destroyed by unrestrained and competitive taxation of alcoholic beverages by the Federal Government and by the governments of the States, counties, and cities; and

Whereas the imposition by the Federal Government of taxes or other imposts on alcoholic beverages without regard to similar burdens imposed by the States, counties, and cities may result in a combined load of taxation so heavy as to encourage illicit traffic in these beverages; and

Whereas before Federal prohibition the States, counties, and cities depended on liquor taxes and license fees for a substantial proportion of their tax revenues, thus lightening the load of taxation on real property; and

Whereas if liquor taxes are again to carry a reasonable share of the State and local tax burden, it is essential that the taxation of alcoholic beverages by the Federal Government be not excessive; and

Whereas there is grave danger that unless immediate action is taken by the States, counties, and cities in establishing a line of communication with the Federal Government through such bodies as the interstate assembly and the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation, the opportunity to secure a fair division of liquor tax revenues will be lost: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That Congress be urged to adopt the recommendations formulated by the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation at a meeting in Washington, D.C., November 10–11, 1933, and ratified by the interstate assembly, which provide that, of the combined gross revenues from the liquor traffic derived by the Federal and State Governments from all sources, one half should inure to the benefit of the States and their localities and the remaining half should be retained by the Federal Government; be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully urged and requested to approve any bill embodying the principles of the above recommendations in order that the provisions thereof may become effective at an early date; be it further

Resolved, That a properly attested copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Members of the Congress from Wisconsin.

President of the Senate.

Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas it is generally believed by the people of Minnesota that the early development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterways would be of incalculable benefit to this State and the entire Northwest; and

Whereas this much desired improvement is being retarded, if not blocked, by the power interests of New York State: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, That we call upon our representatives in the Congress to join with all proper forces in removing obstructions to the early completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterways; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the entire delegation of Minnesota representatives in the Congress.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the house of representatives the 6th day of January 1934.

HARRY L. ALLEN,
Chief Clerk, House of Representatives.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD also presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Tom Mooney and Warren K. Billings have been incarcerated in the prisons of California for 17 years, having been framed and convicted on perjured evidence; and

Whereas the working class in the United States and throughout the world have continuously demonstrated their unshaken faith in the innocence of these men, and their determination to continue the militant mass struggle to secure the immediate and unconditional release of Mooney and Billings; and

Whereas numerous religious institutions and liberal organizations have also demanded the freedom of Mooney and Billings on the basis of their proven innocence; and

Whereas Judge Franklin Griffen, foremost jurist in the State of California, and trial judge in Mooney's case, has declared the following: "The Mooney case is one of the dirtiest jobs ever put over, and I resent that my court was used for such a contemptible piece of work. There is no evidence against him; there is not a serious suggestion that any exist; Mooney is innocent and ought to be pardoned."

The captain of police assigned to investigate the "Preparedness day bomb murders" has stated that Mooney and Billings were not given a fair and impartial trial and that Mooney and Billings should be pardoned.

The 10 living Mooney jurors plead for his pardon. The chief prosecutor of Mooney says that Mooney should be released. The attorney general of California has on two occasions requested a new trial for Mooney. The captain of detectives that helped convict him has stated that Mooney did not have a fair trial and that sanctity of the courts has been violated.

The five chief witnesses against Mooney have either confessed to or have proven to be perjurers.

A commission appointed by President Wilson raised the doubts about Mooney's guilt. In 1932 a commission appointed by President Hoover branded the case as an example of miscarriage of justice. On May 23, 1933, Mooney was again brought on trial and acquitted, yet he was sent back to prison in spite of his innocence.

Mooney's and Billings' innocence have long ago been established: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota urge Governor Rolph to grant an immediate and unconditional release to Mooney and Billings; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the President of the United States that he instruct the Attorney General to intervene before the United States Supreme Court for immediate release of Mooney and Billings at the hearing of the Mooney case before said Supreme Court set for January 3, 1934; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the United States Senators from Minnesota and United States Congressmen from Minnesota, and also to Governor Rolph of the State of California.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the house of representatives the 2d day of January 1934.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY PROJECT—MEMORIALS

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I present certain letters, a telegram, and memorials in regard to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project and ask that they may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the letters, telegram, and memorials were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Springfield, Mass., January 3, 1934.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COOLIDGE: Since it appears that the question of ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty may be before the Senate at an early date, the liberty is taken of bringing to your attention the vote of this chamber in opposition to such ratification recorded November 7, 1932, and forwarded to you shortly thereafter.

Very truly yours,

F. J. HILLMAN,
Executive Vice President.

BOSTON, MASS., January 8, 1934.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE—OPPOSE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY—URGENT, ACT IMMEDIATELY—ACTION OF THE PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, DECEMBER 18, 1933

THIS CANADIAN MEASURE WILL DISCOURAGE AND DEFEAT ESSENTIAL PROJECTS TO PROMOTE COMMERCE AND EMPLOYMENT WITHIN THE UNITED STATES

The Philadelphia conference of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, held at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia, Pa., December 18, unanimously adopted resolutions opposing ratification by the United States Senate of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty and urged the allotment of Civil Works Administration funds to such waterway projects as have been recommended by the association and have received final approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

More than 500 delegates from the States along the Atlantic seaboard, and from other States, attended the conference, which was addressed by United States Senators, Members of Congress, mayors, representatives of cities and towns, commercial and trade organizations, and others.

The substance of the resolutions adopted by the conference is as follows:

"Resolved, That we oppose the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty now pending before the United States Senate and urge its rejection by the Senate; and be it further

"Resolved, That before any further consideration be given to the treaty that an economic survey be made by a governmental agency of the projects proposed therein.

* * * * * * *

"Resolved, That we reaffirm the several declarations and resolutions adopted at the last annual meeting of this association held in October last in the city of Baltimore; and be it further

"Resolved, That such projects as have been recommended by this association and have received the final approval of the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War should receive an allotment of funds from the Public Works Administration, and we recommend same to the favorable consideration of the Administrator of Public Works."

Further, the conference requested the president of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association to appoint forthwith a special committee to "vigorously and continuously coordinate and promote national opposition" to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, to use "every legitimate means at its disposal to give practical effect to this opposition", to cooperate with others opposing this treaty, and to demand the expenditure of United States money on United States projects. The undersigned committee was named.

Congress meets on January 3, 1934. The treaty will be subject to action by the Senate immediately thereafter.

Write your Senator and ask him to vote against ratification. Urge your friends to do likewise.

Point out the advantage of giving employment to citizens of the United States on the projects within your State which this association has endorsed and which have the approval of the War Department. Tell them that the money you pay in taxes should be spent at home and not for the benefit of foreign shippers and foreign labor.

Cooperate, whenever possible, with the members of the undersigned committee in getting the facts before the public.

The time is short. Do it now.

READ AND ACT AT ONCE!—RESOLUTIONS OPPOSING THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY—PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY—NEW JERSEY SHIP CANAL AND ATLANTIC INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY, DECEMBER 18, 1933

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY

Whereas we, more than 500 delegates, representing the New England, Middle Atlantic, Southern, and Gulf States, the population of which represents two thirds of the entire population of the United States and more than 80 percent of its taxpayers, assembled in conference in the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel in Philadelphia, Pa., on Monday, December 18, 1933, including National and State legislators, mayors, industrial and trade officials, commercial, civic, and service organizations, after due consideration and discussion, strenuously oppose the menace of the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty now pending for ratification before the United States Senate, and we oppose as economic suicide the said ratification on patriotic and economic grounds, including the following:

It proposes the construction of a new deep waterway route, 90 percent of which lies in Canada, and construction of hydroelectric power plants, 80 percent of which will reside in and belong to Canada; to internationalize Lake Michigan, now entirely an American lake, and to surrender our sovereignty over it; to have the United States advance, in the first instance, all the costs, amounting to possibly more than a billion dollars; to allow Canada to deduct from her share of the expense the amount of her expenditures for waterway improvements heretofore made in Canada and denies to the United States similar credits for practically all moneys expended in American territory; provides that all improvements made in Canada (80 to 90 percent) shall be made with Canadian labor, Canadian materials, and by Canadian engineers; favors the position of the Canadian wheat exporter in his keen competition with the American wheat farmer who is already handicapped by British preferential tariffs; provides the means to divert the Great-Lakes traffic which now finds its way to the Atlantic and the Gulf through American waterways and over American railroads to Canadian ports by means of Canadian transportation facilities, all to the injury and destruction of our own rail and waterway transportation facilities and to the injury also of American investors in our transportation enterprises and terminals: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we oppose the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty now pending before the United States Senate and urge its rejection by the Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That before any further consideration be given to the treaty that an economic survey be made by a governmental agency of the projects proposed therein.

If you oppose this un-American treaty, write your Senator immediately.

Respectfully,

Blair, Wilmington, N.C.; Harry G. Barbee, Norfolk, Va.; John H. Small, Washington, D.C.; Frederick W. Donnelly, Trenton, N.J.; J. Hampton Moore, Philadelphia, Pa. (ex officio), special committee.

ATLANTIC DEEPER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, January 2, 1934.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I respectfully direct your attention to the enclosed circular letter, also copy of a resolution adopted at the conference held in Philadelphia on December 18, 1933, in opposition to the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty.

This association is strenuously opposed to ratification at this time and believes that the funds to be spent by the United States on this project would serve a more useful purpose if used upon projects wholly within the United States.

We invite your careful consideration of the matter and respectfully urge you to vote against ratification, since, among other things, the alleged benefits to be derived do not appear to justify the enormous cost.

With best wishes, I am, very truly yours,

J. H. MOORE, President.

Re: Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: One of the most important matters which will come before the United States Senate at the session of Congress opening today will be that of the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. The approval of the United States Senate to this treaty with Canada will result in a long step being taken forward toward the construction of a most expensive international waterway, the actual need of which is still most uncertain. Of very vital importance to our country is the possibility of great harm being done to New England and other sections of the United States by the construction of this international waterway.

In a circular covering the resolutions opposing the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway treaty, recently issued by a special committee of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, it is stated that:

"It proposes the construction of a new deep waterway route, 90 percent of which lies in Canada, and construction of hydroelectric power plants, 80 percent of which will reside in and belong to Canada; to internationalize Lake Michigan, now entirely an American lake, and to surrender our sovereignty over it; to have the United States advance, in the first instance, all the costs, amounting to possibly more than a billion dollars; to allow Canada to deduct from her share of the expense the amount of her expenditures for waterway improvements heretofore made in Canada, and denies to the United States similar credits for practically all moneys expended in American territory; provides that all improvements made in Canada—80 to 90 percent—shall be made with Canadian labor, Canadian materials, and by Canadian engineers; favors the position of the Canadian wheat exporter in his keen competition with the American wheat farmer who is already handicapped by British preferential tariffs; provides the means to divert the Great Lakes traffic which now finds its way to the Atlantic and the Gulf through American waterways and over American railroads to Canadian ports by means of Canadian transportation facilities; all to the injury and destruction of our own rail and waterway transportation facilities and to the injury, also, of American investors in our transportation enterprises and terminals."

If this portion of this statement of this association gives a true analysis of the facts, then it is time for our Representatives in Congress to most strenuously oppose the further expenditure of public funds in foreign countries and for foreign needs. It is about time that the United States stop being used as a lamb for fleecing purposes by foreign countries under the urge of ill-advised and untruthful propaganda disseminated throughout our country by those having more than a passing interest in such practices.

This letter is written in behalf of the New Bedford Board of Commerce, an organization representing the civic, business, and industrial interests of the city of New Bedford, and the New England Traffic League, an organization of transportation men representing approximately 200 industries and commercial organizations of New England.

Very respectfully yours,

A. H. FERGUSON,
Manager Bureau of Transportation and Public Service; Chairman Executive Committee the New England Traffic League.

BOSTON, January 9, 1934.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I would like to call your attention to the proposed ratification of the St. Lawrence River Treaty, which I assume will come before you during this session of Congress. We are very much opposed to the ratification of this treaty until a proper investigation is made on this whole subject, and we trust that you will see that the interests of New England are protected by opposing this treaty.

Very truly yours,

MOTOR TRUCK OWNERS SERVICE BUREAU,
DAY BAKER, Legislative Counsel.

LAWRENCE, MASS., January 8, 1934.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COOLIDGE: The directors of the Lawrence Chamber of Commerce unanimously voted opposition to the St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, and also that notice of this action be sent to our two United States Senators.

From information which the board of directors have at hand, the opposition to the treaty was based on the following:

1. The treaty should be given no further consideration until an official economic survey has been made by a competent, unbiased United States commission and until it can be proved beyond doubt that there will be an adequate return on the gigantic investment that would be required.

2. Ninety percent of the St. Lawrence River lies wholly within Canada.

3. Ninety percent of the grain that might be exported through the St. Lawrence would be Canadian grain.

4. Ninety-eight percent of the ocean-going ships that would transport grain would be foreign bottoms.

5. Eighty percent of the waterpower capable of development would be Canadian; in order words, four of the five million horsepower which could be harnessed would be Canadian.

6. Sixty-six and two thirds percent of the new money invested in this project would be United States money.

7. Therefore the project is 80 percent to 90 percent Canadian, while 66⅔ percent of the new money would be paid by the United States.

8. This proposed waterway could only be operated 7 months of the year, at best.

9. Expert engineers and analysts of international reputation certify that the cost of this project would be more than double the estimates.

10. The treaty would make the United States surrender Lake Michigan and make it an international lake.

11. The treaty in article VIII does not provide sufficient water diversion for the Chicago Drainage Canal or for the Mississippi River channel.

12. The western farmer has been told he would be saved 8 to 10 cents a bushel on grain transportation, while the present rate is only about 4½ cents from Duluth and Fort William to Montreal.

13. The total cost of the power developed with the construction of trunk-line transmission lines, rights-of-way, etc., would be so great that the power could not compete with established power companies, when the taxes the citizens will have to pay on the development are taken into consideration.

14. The United States Department of Commerce, in a purported economic survey dated 1926, states in its report that no attempt has been made to determine the amount of traffic which would actually move over this proposed canal or the total amount of savings that might result.

15. There are scores of other unanswerable facts which have been presented to the United States Senate as to why the treaty should not be ratified, which prove that this uneconomic, impractical proposition should not be allowed to load this gigantic financial burden on the taxpayers, particularly at a time like this, and that the project would not help unemployment in this country, as the majority of those engaged on the work would, under the treaty, be Canadian engineers and labor, and a large percentage of the work would be done by machinery.

16. This project would, in no way, give immediate relief to the present-day unemployment, which the same money spent elsewhere would do.

We believe in United States money for United States projects wholly within the United States, and to be used for the employment of United States labor.

It appears to the board of directors from the foregoing that the proposed St. Lawrence Treaty is undoubtedly favorable to Canada and that before final action is taken on this treaty, thorough study and investigation should be made before committing this Nation to a treaty which does not appear to be equitable. In accordance with this sentiment, the directors of the Lawrence Chamber of Commerce earnestly request you to oppose the ratification of the proposed St. Lawrence Treaty.

Very truly yours,

LAWRENCE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
JOHN J. O'ROURKE, Secretary.

JANUARY 9, 1934.

Hon. MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. COOLIDGE: Among the agenda for the next year proposed to some of the New England commercial bodies is the following:

"Opposition to ratification of St. Lawrence waterway as an enterprise adversely affecting New England."

I beg leave to question the correctness of this assumption.

The interests of New England are not opposed to the interests of the country at large, nor can New England escape the repercussion of any great and lasting injury suffered by any region of our country, much less can it escape the result of any injury suffered by the region to which transportation is furnished by the Great Lakes.

That region with its numerous cities, running from Lake Ontario to the heads of Lakes Michigan and Superior, has a natural outlet to the ocean, ending with the St. Lawrence Valley. All but a short section of this outlet has already been improved for navigation by large ocean-going vessels. The present is a time when this waterway can be completed to advantage owing to the need of starting public works for furnishing employment.

In addition to its great agricultural interest, that region is especially adapted to heavy industries. It therefore has especial need for the cheap water transportation which completion of the St. Lawrence Valley improvement would afford.

These industries can be multiplied and greatly developed by means of such facilities.

The population that can be so supported is naturally tributary to the textile and other industries on which New England depends. The two regions supplement each other.

The prosperity of that region under the same tariff will mean prosperity to New England in countless ways, through demand for New England products. Injury to that region will work corresponding injury to New England.

Even from the most narrow and sordid point of view, New England cannot afford to throttle the natural outlet of this great region to the sea by asking its Senators to take advantage of the two-thirds vote required for treaty ratification on which completion of the waterway depends.

There are, however, additional reasons why this so-called "interest" in stopping this outlet should not be invoked by those who may think that for the immediate present there may be something in it.

What kind of a country are we going to have if the vital and lasting advantages of one region are to be sacrificed to the small advantage of another? Are we to be a nation of people helping and standing by one another, or a collection of parochial-minded sections jealously competing in mutual strangulation?

What would New England have thought if the lake region and the upper Mississippi Valley had opposed the Panama Canal, on the ground that it would give the Atlantic seacoast an advantage over them in commerce with the Pacific coast, as it has?

What kind of a standing will New England have when some of its own interests are at stake in Washington, as they frequently are, in tariff and other matters, if its commercial bodies and its Representatives have inaugurated such a narrow and selfish policy of mutual injury?

Are we to expect the utmost consideration from those to whom we have a lasting and gratuitous injury at a time when public works at no profit at all are being undertaken for the mere employment of the idle?

From no point of view, either broad or narrow, selfish or unselfish, is it to the interest of New England to shut off the basin of the Great Lakes from access to the sea?

Very truly yours,

R. M. BRADLEY.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the resolutions adopted by the National Farmers' Union at its annual convention, held in Omaha, Nebr., November 20, 21, and 22, 1933.

The Farmers' Union is one of our great national farm organizations, and its program is worthy of the careful attention of every Member of the Senate. For myself, I want to say that I am in entire sympathy with the purposes of the Farmers' Union, and in a general way find myself in accord with nearly all of the program.

I would especially urge Senators to notice the strong endorsement given the so-called "Frazier bill" providing the refinancing of farm mortgages at a rate of 3-percent interest.

Another part of their program calls for the repeal of the Federal tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline. Farmers are among the largest purchasers of gasoline, and are heavily hit by this tax, which in my judgment should be allowed to the States for highway purposes only. I have introduced a bill to repeal this tax, and hope to see it passed at this session.

The Farmers' Union also calls upon Congress, and rightly, to "pass such legislation as would, absolutely, prohibit gambling in farm products by boards of trade, cotton exchanges, and other speculators."

I most heartily endorse that plank in their platform of needed legislation, and have introduced a bill to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. President, I send to the desk the resolutions adopted by the National Farmers' Union, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION PROGRAM, ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY IN ANNUAL CONVENTION HELD IN OMAHA, NEBR., NOVEMBER 20, 21, 22, 1933

1. The Frazier bill, providing for the Government's refinancing farmers at a rate of 1½-percent interest.

2. The Swank-Thomas bill, providing for Government regulation of the marketing of farm crops on a basis of the farmer receiving for that portion of his crop needed for domestic consumption a price of not less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit.

3. The Wheeler bill, providing for the remonetization of silver.

4. The Thomas bill, which provides for the Government issuing full legal-tender, non-interest-bearing currency to pay the debts of the Nation instead of issuing more interest-bearing bonds.

5. We believe all taxation should be based on ability to pay. We further believe there is just one test of ability to pay, and that is net income at the end of the year. We therefore support such rates on net incomes as will pay the running expenses of government.

We realize that the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few to the extent that today in the United States less than 5 percent of the people own 90 percent of the wealth of the Nation is a menace to the life of the Nation. History teaches from Babylon to Russia that where such conditions exist one of two things happens—either there is redistribution of wealth or revolution and overthrow of the government.

To prevent the latter the Farmers' Union proposes such amendments to the inheritance and gifts tax law as will limit the amount an individual can take from an estate to one half million dollars.

6. We are opposed to the large appropriations being made in preparation for war.

For 40 years this Nation has preached peace while at the same time spending more money every year on wars—past, present, and future—than any other country in the world. It is our position that such a policy is hypocritical and inconsistent.

We are also unalterably opposed to compulsory military training in any form, and especially in tax-supported institutions of learning.

7. Farmers are the largest purchasers of gasoline of any group, hence the largest payers of gasoline taxes. We are opposed to the Federal taxes on gasoline and to the diversion of tax funds raised by the various States from road building and maintenance purposes.

8. We believe Congress should pass such legislation as would absolutely prohibit gambling in farm products by boards of trade, cotton exchanges, and other speculators.

9. It is our position that so long as industry is protected by tariff, agriculture is entitled to the same protection.

10. We urge the next session of Congress to pass such legislation as will give the Philippines immediate and absolute independence.

11. We favor further and more effective legislation against the use of oriental oils in the manufacture of oleomargarine. Such legislation is needed to protect the dairy farmers of the Nation.

12. The eighteenth amendment has been repealed. We favor such legislation as will place the manufacture and distribution of all intoxicating liquors in the Government. This would remove profits, which is the biggest element of evil in the liquor traffic.

* * * * * * *

It is the position of the Farmers' Union that agriculture should be placed on an equality with industry in the matter of tariffs.

At the present time wheat is being imported in this country. Oriental oils and fats are coming in at an increased ratio. Cattle are the lowest in price in 50 years, yet a large percent of the canned beef found in the chain stores in this country comes from South America.

We demand that in all these things the Government should immediately place an embargo against foreign importations of agricultural products in which this country produces more than enough for home consumption.

During the war American boys from farm and factory served their country in France in the mud and rain of the trenches for the pittance of $1.25 cents per day, while the millionaires at home were piling more millions on top of their already swollen fortunes, coining money out of the blood of the flower of our American youth.

The Government is taxing the people to pile up a sinking fund to pay these ex-service boys an adjusted compensation in 1945. This is a very expensive way of paying the acknowledged debt due our ex-service men.

Business languishes, people go naked and starve for lack of medium of exchange with which to transact business: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Farmers' Union is in favor of the Government issuing full legal-tender, non-interest-bearing currency and paying this debt to the ex-service boys at once. Such a method will cost the Government much less than the sinking-fund plan and will furnish 2¼ billion dollars of real medium of exchange over which the bankers will have no control;

* * * * * * *

Whereas there have been offered in the United States Congress two or more radical proposals intended to repeal the existing food and drug law, and to substitute in its place a measure which, according to our belief, would radically change the administration of such a law, by conferring dictatorial power upon the Secretary of Agriculture, unwarranted and unjustifiable at this time: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this proposed act be amended so as to exclude the word "food" from its provisions, and regulations of the food industries be continued under the present law; be it further

Resolved, That this convention places itself on record as opposing any legislation or any ruling by any one in authority that would in any way hamper or destroy the usefulness of reciprocal mutual cooperative fire, automobile, and life-insurance companies which have been successfully operated for many years and are of unquestioned stability.

* * * * * * *

Be it resolved by the National Farmers' Union, That we ask the President of the United States to direct the Attorney General to file suit in the proper court to require the Secretary of Agriculture to make public the names of those short sellers who are destroying the prices of grain, and that if the President of the United States fails or refuses to comply with the resolution in that respect, then the National Farmers' Union join in a move to expose such names.

* * * * * * *

An uninformed electorate is dangerous to a free republic: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the national convention pledge itself to furnish every member the vote of the national Senators and Representatives on major agricultural bills.

We demand immediate national moratorium on farm foreclosures until such times as the Government provides adequate refinancing, such as the Frazier bill.

Resolved, That we recommend to our membership the serious consideration of the methods and efforts of the national Farmers' Holiday Association to arouse public sentiment to the injustice to agriculture.

Resolved, Since our Farmers' Union cooperatives are not operated for profit but to effect a saving to the membership and all operating strictly in accord with the provisions of the Capper-Volstead Act (and also, as in the case of the Packer and Stockyards Administration), which forbids the promiscuous and indiscriminate proration of dividends beyond the bounds of bona fide membership; and be it further

Resolved, That, whereas the Internal Revenue Department now refuses to concede our eligibility to income tax exemption (a policy that has been long recognized as unassailable), but now proposes to assess us as profit concerns, we, your committee, herein recognize an emergency and recommend that the national Union assist our cooperatives with all its power to solve this problem and protect our enterprises.

The National Farmers' Union goes on record as being unalterably opposed to the direct purchasing of livestock such as is being practiced by the big packers at this time by which they are thwarting the intent and purpose of the open competitive terminal marketing system, where values of livestock are established.

We recommend to our national president, who is our legislative Representative at Washington, D.C., to take such steps as are necessary to have the Sherman antitrust law invoked to stop this vicious practice in restraint of trade such as was done by the attorney general of Nebarska in 1929. Because of this unwritten agreement between the large processors of meat in allotting territory in which there is no competition, it places the producer of livestock at the mercy of the packing industry to establish prices on their commodities.

And we further recommend that our national president exert every effort available at his command to bring to the attention of the United States Senate and Congress the necessity of amending the Packers and Stockyards Act, to bring under its jurisdiction all independent packing-plant stockyards and all other livestock markets where as many as 1,000 head of livestock is sold daily.

That a copy of this demand be wired President F. D. Roosevelt.

REPORTS OF THE CLAIMS COMMITTEE

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1321) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Korber Realty, Inc., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 177) thereon.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 72) to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the cost of maintaining the present system of future trading in agricultural products and to ascertain what classes of citizens bear such cost; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONTROL OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. WALSH submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 14, section 10, line 22, after the word "thereon", to insert the following:

"The board shall be empowered to limit all licenses when in their discretion the further issuance of any license will be detrimental to the public welfare."

On page 23, section 12, subsection (b), line 13, after the word "license", to insert the following:

"No person (person to mean as defined in sec. 2, subsec. M, p. 6, lines 11 and 12) shall hold more than one retailer's license."

FEDERAL COMPENSATION AND VETERANS' BENEFITS—AMENDMENT

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment, which I wish to call up when House bill 6663, the independent offices appropriation bill, comes from the House. I wish to have the amendment lie on the table, printed, and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill to insert the following:

"SEC. —. That all of the provisions of the following acts reducing or limiting the compensation of Federal officers and employees, reducing or limiting or voiding the benefits, payments, care, treatment of American veterans, their dependents and beneficiaries—

"Public Law No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, first session, approved June 16, 1933 (48 Stat., pt. 1, p. 283), entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, board, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes'; Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, first session, approved March 20, 1933 (48 Stat., pt. 1, p. 8), entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government'; Public Law No. 428, Seventy-second Congress, first session, approved March 3, 1933 (47 Stat., pt. 1, p. 1489), entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes'; and Public Law No. 212, Seventy-second Congress, first session, approved June 30, 1932 (47 Stat., pt. 1, p. 382), entitled 'An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes'—are hereby repealed; and such compensation is hereby restored to those basic salary or wage rates in effect on May 30, 1932, whether on an annual, monthly, weekly, per diem, hourly, piecework, or other bases: Provided, That the rates of compensation for the several trades and occupations, which are set by wage boards or other wage-fixing authorities, shall be reestablished and maintained at rates not lower than those contained in the respective wage schedules in effect on May 30, 1932: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as reducing any compensation: And provided further, That employees of the Government who were entitled to promotions in rank or increases in salary or wages, and which promotions or increases were prevented through the enactment of any of the laws above referred to, shall be granted such promotions and increases as of the date such promotions and increases would have taken effect had the laws above referred to not been enacted.

"SEC. 2. This act shall become effective the day following its enactment."

PERMITS TO IMPORT ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 127), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Alcohol Control Administration be requested to send to the Senate the names of all persons that have been granted permits to import alcoholic beverages of any kind, the quantity granted each permittee, and the country from which said imports are to be received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it is found necessary by the Committee on Finance to have 1,000 additional copies of a certain hearing printed, and by direction of the Committee on Printing I report a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution, S.Res. 128, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, on the bills S. 1712 and H.R. 5755, entitled "A bill to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes."

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 129), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections hereby is authorized to employ an assistant clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,000 per annum until otherwise provided by law.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 130), as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President under authority of Senate Resolution No. 174, agreed to July 11, 1932, to investigate campaign expenditures for President and Senators in the 1932 primaries and elections, hereby is granted an extension of time for making its full report to the Senate until the 1st day of February 1934; and said committee hereby is continued in full force and effect pending its report.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FESS. I understand from the reading of the resolution that it does not do any more than extend the time of the committee to report?

Mr. CONNALLY. All the resolution does is that which is suggested by the Senator from Ohio. It extends the life of the committee to the 1st of February purely for the purpose of making its report. There are to be no further hearings. The hearings have been concluded. The report was supposed to have been submitted on the first day of the session, but some of the members of the committee were absent at that time. I have already prepared a report so far as I am concerned, but it is necessary to get concurrence of the other members of the committee who have been out of the city. I feel that I can assure the Senate that it will be only a few days until the committee is able to submit a report, or reports if we disagree, so the Senate will have the information.

Mr. FESS. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

ANTIDUMPING LEGISLATION IN THE UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES (S.DOC. NO. 112)

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document a report prepared for the Federal Trade Commission by the Export Trade Section of the Commission on antidumping legislation in the United States and foreign countries. This is a very complete report, and I think is of marked interest to the country and the Congress at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FOREIGN FOOD PRODUCTS PURCHASED BY WAR DEPARTMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the previous day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 125) submitted by Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana on the 10th instant, as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that during the year 1933 large amounts of foreign food products were purchased under the direction of the Secretary of War for use in supplying rations to the Army and the Civilian Conservation Corps; and

Whereas there appeared in the Washington Herald for the morning of January 9, 1934, the following article:

"ARMY AND C.C.C. TO 'EAT AMERICAN'

"The Army and the C.C.C. will consume American products only this year.

"Last spring considerable Argentine beef was purchased, but Assistant Secretary of War Woodring assured President Roosevelt yesterday that this won't happen again.

"The 'doughboys' will also get more cheese this year. In response to the demands of dairy interests, the Army will purchase 1,000,000 pounds for rations": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is requested to transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, a report showing the amounts of foreign beef and other foreign food products purchased by the War Department since March 4, 1933, for the use of the Army and the Civilian Conservation Corps, and the prices paid therefor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is a resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who apparently is not in the Chamber.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, would the Senator from Arkansas be willing to have the resolution passed over until the Senator from Indiana shall return to the Chamber?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I was going to suggest that perhaps he would like to be present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be passed over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said:

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has entered the Chamber since his resolution was called up a few moments ago, being Senate Resolution 125.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Arkansas just said, I will state that I have received the information I asked for in the resolution and, therefore, I ask that I be given permission to withdraw the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I send to the desk a letter from the War Department and ask that it be read. It supplies the information which I sought.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read the letter, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., January 10, 1934.

Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to telephone request of Mr. Mercey, of your office, the following information is furnished.

Under ordinary conditions the Army does not purchase any considerable quantity of canned beef. However, during the spring and early summer of 1933 when the Civilian Conservation Corps was being assembled at Regular Army posts and being sent to their work camps, it was necessary to buy several hundred thousand pounds of canned corn beef. It was then learned that the market contained a limited quantity of American canned corn beef. This situation apparently was caused by the fact that American meat packers with subsidiaries in South America were able to ship canned meat from that country to the United States in spite of the duty and still undersell their own product in this country.

The War Department, at the time mentioned, purchased all available American canned corn beef and, in addition, bought a quantity of South American canned corn beef estimated at about 370,000 pounds. The time element did not permit the delay that would have resulted had foreign canned beef not been purchased at that period.

In October 1933 the War Department issued instructions prohibiting the purchase within the continental United States of foreign foodstuffs of any kind or for any purpose except those of a nature not produced in the United States.

With the exception of the canned meat referred to above, purchases by the War Department of imported food products for use in the continental United States have been insignificant except for those articles mentioned above as not being produced in the United States; namely, tea, coffee, cocoa, chocolate, and spices.

Trusting this will give you the information you desire, I remain,
Sincerely yours,

HARRY H. WOODRING,
The Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, in connection with the letter just read, I should like to give some figures showing the increase in the importations of canned meats.

In 1931 there were 18,119,531 pounds imported. The importations for 11 months of last year were 39,177,193 pounds, which would represent 157,010 cows, showing that even with the low prices of beef prevailing in this country South American beef is coming in here all the time.

REPORTS OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution coming over from the previous day, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 126) submitted by Mr. DICKINSON on the 10th instant, as follows:

Whereas Executive Order No. 6548, dated January 3, 1934, has been revoked and an Executive order in lieu thereof issued, reading, in part, as follows: "It is hereby ordered that all executive departments (other than the Treasury Department), independent establishments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the United States, including corporations without capital stock which are owned by the Government and corporations with capital stock of which 50 percent or more is owned by the Government, except corporations which were in existence prior to January 1, 1932, shall hereafter submit to the Director of the Budget a weekly report containing an itemized statement of all allocations of funds made during the preceding week out of any emergency appropriation or other available emergency fund, and a weekly report containing an itemized statement of all obligations incurred during the preceding week for the expenditure of any emergency appropriation or other available emergency fund. Such reports shall include the allocation of funds and the incurring of obligations through the issuance of securities. The Director of the Budget shall keep a current compilation and tabulation of the above-mentioned allocations and obligations so reported and from time to time make such recommendations thereon to the President as he may deem advisable":

Resolved, That a copy of all said reports furnished the Director of the Budget be filed with the Secretary of the Senate for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the resolution was submitted to the Senate yesterday. I respectfully suggest to the author of the resolution that perhaps he would like to modify the language slightly, so as to request that copies of the reports furnished the Director of the Budget be filed with the Secretary of the Senate for the information of the Senate, and so forth. If the resolution may be modified in that particular, I can see no objection to its adoption; and I am also authorized by the Director of the Budget to state that he will very gladly comply with the resolution and file the reports.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have no objection to modification of the resolution in that respect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest a modification by inserting the words "it is requested", so as to read:

Resolved, That it is requested a copy of all said reports furnished the Director of the Budget be filed with the Secretary of the Senate for the information of the Senate.

I offer that as an amendment to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

JOHN C. MERRIAM

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I call from the table the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 70) to provide for the reappointment of John C. Merriam as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution and ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 70) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, caused by the expiration of the term of John C. Merriam, of the city of Washington, on December 20, 1933, be filled by the reappointment of the recent incumbent (John C. Merriam) for the statutory term of 6 years.

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN MINNESOTA MORTGAGE-MORATORIUM CASE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the other day the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion in the so-called "Minnesota mortgage-moratorium case." I think it is generally admitted that it was an epoch-making decision. That decision, with the footnotes, was published in the RECORD of January 10 in the House proceedings. I ask unanimous consent that the entire decision, the majority opinion, the dissenting opinion, the Minnesota law, and the footnotes may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the request. Is the Senator asking that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota case be made a Senate document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. GORE. Does the request include both the majority and minority opinions?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; the entire record, including the State law and the footnotes.

Mr. GORE. Were both opinions printed in the RECORD yesterday? I did not happen to be here.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am told that they were printed in the RECORD of January 9. I have not had time to read the RECORD through. If they were not printed in the RECORD of yesterday, I ask to have the minority opinion printed also. I want the entire record printed.

Mr. GORE. I wish to suggest, if the Senator does not object, that I should like to include in the document the decision in the case of Townsend against Townsend, in First Peck, a Tennessee case, decided in 1821. I will not insist if the Senator objects.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask at this point that extracts from the decision in the case of Townsend against Townsend, to which I have referred, and also an extract from the case of Johnson v. Duncan & Al.'s Syndics. (3 Martin's Rept.), a Louisiana case decided in 1815, both of which I will furnish, may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and also printed as a Senate document. It will be interesting to every Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE subsequently said: Mr. President, I have conferred with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. He does not object to the extracts from opinions to which I referred and has consented to have them included in the document which he asked to have printed a few moments ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the document referred to will include the matter suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that 2 or 3 pages from the Life of Washington by John Marshall may be printed in the RECORD and in the Senate document authorized pursuant to the request of the Senator from Minnesota a moment ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma requests modification of the unanimous consent granted a few moments ago at the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] to include 2 or 3 pages from the Life of George Washington by Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. GORE. It is 2 or 3 pages taken from the Life of George Washington by John Marshall relating to the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the modification?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, on account of the confusion I did not hear the request of the Senator from Oklahoma. Will he please state it again?

Mr. GORE. I am requesting that there be added to the document, authorized a few moments ago at the instance of the Senator from Minnesota, 2 or 3 pages from the Life of George Washington written by John Marshall pertaining to the same subject. I am sure it will be very illuminating.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The extract and opinion ordered printed in the RECORD on request of Mr. GORE are as follows:

[From "Life of Washington" by Chief Justice Marshall]

The discontents and uneasiness, arising in a great measure from the embarrassments in which a considerable number of individuals were involved, continued to become more extensive. At length two great parties were formed in every State, which were distinctly marked, and which pursued distinct objects, with systematic arrangement.

The one struggled with unabated zeal for the exact observance of public and private engagements. By those belonging to it the faith of a nation or of a private man was deemed a sacred pledge, the violation of which was equally forbidden by the principles of moral justice and of sound policy. The distresses of individuals were, they thought, to be alleviated only by industry and frugality, not by a relaxation of the laws or by a sacrifice of the rights of others. According to the stern principles laid down for their government the imprudent and idle could not be protected by the legislature from the consequences of their indiscretion, but should be restrained from involving themselves in difficulties by the conviction that a rigid compliance with contracts would be enforced. They were consequently the uniform friends of a regular administration of justice and of a vigorous course of taxation which would enable the State to comply with its engagements. By a natural association of ideas they were also, with very few exceptions, in favor of enlarging the powers of the Federal Government and of enabling it to protect the dignity and character of the Nation abroad and its interests at home. The other party marked out for itself a more indulgent course. Viewing with extreme tenderness the case of the debtor, their efforts were unceasingly directed to his relief. To exact a faithful compliance with contracts was, in their opinion, a measure too harsh to be insisted on and was one which the people would not bear. They were uniformly in favor of relaxing the administration of justice, of affording facilities for the payment of debts or of suspending their collection, and of remitting taxes. The same course of opinion led them to resist every attempt to transfer from their own hands into those of Congress powers which by others were deemed essential to the preservation of the Union. In many of the States the party last mentioned constituted a decided majority of the people; and in all of them it was very powerful. The emission of paper money, the delay of legal proceedings, and the suspension of the collection of taxes were the fruits of their rule wherever they were completely dominant. Even where they failed in carrying their measures, their strength was such as to encourage the hope of succeeding in a future attempt, and annual elections held forth to them the prospect of speedily repairing the loss of a favorite question. Throughout the Union the contest between these parties was periodically revived, and the public mind was perpetually agitated with hopes and fears on subjects which essentially affected the fortunes of a considerable proportion of the society.

These contests were the more animated, because, in the State governments generally, no principle had been introduced which could resist the wild projects of the moment, give the people an opportunity to reflect, and allow the good sense of the Nation time for exertion. This uncertainty with respect to measures of great importance to every member of the community, this instability in principles which ought if possible to be rendered immutable, produced a long train of ills, and is seriously believed to have been among the operating causes of those pecuniary embarrassments which at that time were so general as to influence the legislation of almost every State in the Union. Its direct consequence was the loss of confidence in the Government, and in individuals. This, so far as respected the Government, was peculiarly discernible in the value of State debts.

* * * * * * *

The prospect of extricating the country from these embarrassments was by no means flattering. Whilst everything else fluctuated, some of the causes which produced this calamitous state of things were permanent. The hope and fear still remained that the debtor party would obtain the victory at the elections; and instead of making the painful effort to obtain relief by industry and economy, many rested all their hopes on legislative interference. The mass of national labor and of national wealth was consequently diminished. In every quarter were found those who asserted it to be impossible for the people to pay their public or private debts; and in some instances threats were uttered of suspending the administration of justice by private violence.

By the enlightened friends of republican government, this gloomy state of things was viewed with infinite chagrin; and many became apprehensive that those plans from which so much happiness to the human race had been anticipated, would produce only real misery, and would maintain but a short and a turbulent existence. Meanwhile, the wise and thinking part of the community, who could trace evils to their source, labored unceasingly to inculcate opinions favorable to the incorporation of some principles into the political system, which might correct the obvious vices without endangering the free spirit of the existing institutions.

[From Opinion of the Court in Johnson v. Duncan & Al.'s Syndics (3 Martins La. Repts.)]

The obligation of contracts consists in the necessity under which a man finds himself to do, or refrain from doing, something. This obligation exists generally both in foro legis and in foro conscientiae, though it does at times exist in one of these only. It is certainly of the first, that in foro legis, which the framers of the Constitution spoke when they prohibited the passage of any law impairing the obligations of contracts. Now, a law absolutely recalling the power which the creditor enjoys of compelling his debtor in foro legis to perform the obligation of his contract would be a law destroying the obligation of the contract in foro legis. Since a right, without a legal remedy, ceases to be a legal right, it would impair the obligation of the contract by destroying its legal obligation; in other words, by reducing an obligation both in foro legis and in foro conscientiae to an obligation in foro conscientiæ only—a legal and moral right to a moral right only. The remedy in foro legis, constituting the legal right of the creditor, constitutes also its correlative, the legal duty or obligation of the debtor; and a law which reduces a legal to a moral obligation is one which in foro legis destroys the obligation. It appears, therefore, to me incorrect to say that the legislature may effectually do, as to the remedy or effect of the obligation, that which it cannot do as to the right; and I conclude that a law destroying or impairing the remedy is as unconstitutional as one affecting the right in the same manner; for in foro legis the effects of both laws must be the same.

Likewise a law procrastinating the remedy, generally speaking, destroys part of the right. He pays less who pays later. Minus solvit qui serius solvit. Neither is the procrastination properly compensated by the allowance of interest in the meanwhile. To many men in many circumstances there is a wide difference between $100 payable today and $106 payable in a twelvemonth, whatever may be the certainty that no disappointment will occur; and in many cases the delay is likely to be productive of considerable danger to the solvability of the debtor. Any indulgence, therefore, in point of time, afforded by the legislature to the debtor is a correlative injury to the creditor in the same degree, though of a different nature, as a correspondent indulgence by a proportionate reduction of the debt.

That such were the impressions of the framers of the Constitution will appear, if in expounding that instrument, we follow the rules laid down for the exposition of statutes—if we consider the old law, the mischief and the remedy.

The charter of our Federal rights was framed not many years after the termination of the war which secured our independence. The disasters attending the arduous conflict had disabled many an honest individual from punctually discharging his obligations; and the legislature of some of the States, more attentive to afford immediate and temporary relief than a more remote and lasting one, by a sacred regard for good faith and the consequent preservation of credit, passed laws meliorating the condition of debtors to the injury and ruin of creditors. In one State an emission of paper money, for the redemption of which no day was fixed nor any fund provided, was made a legal tender. In other words, an obligation to pay gold and silver was impaired by being reduced to an obligation to pay irredeemable paper, elsewhere a similar obligation was impaired by being reduced to an obligation to deliver a tract of pine barren land, or an installment law was passed and an obligation to pay today was impaired by being reduced to an obligation to pay at several periods, at the distance of intervening years. Such was the old law. The consequent diminution of the fortunes of several individuals, the total ruin of others, and the indispensable concomitant, the destruction of credit, produced a stagnation of business, which considerably affected public and private prosperity, such was the mischief.

The Federal compact provided that the legislature of no State should retain the power of making anything but gold and silver a tender in the discharge of debts in order to avert in future the mischiefs resulting from laws impairing the obligation of a contract to pay gold and silver by reducing it to an obligation to pay paper, pine barren land, or, indeed, anything but gold and silver. Yet the remedy was not commensurate with the evil; the healing process was, therefore, continued in order to prevent the passage of laws impairing the obligation of a contract to pay today by reducing it to an obligation to pay on a distant day or days; or, indeed, any attempt at a legislative interference between parties to a contract by favoring either party to the injury of the other; and it was provided that no State should pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts. If the restriction from making anything but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts had not preceded that from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, there might be some, though very little, ground to say that the latter clause would have been satisfied by restraining the passage of laws authorizing the payment of one thing instead of another.

I therefore find no difficulty in concluding that an act of a State legislature, the obvious object of which is to relieve debtors by postponing the recovery, and consequently the payment of debts, impairs the obligation of contracts, and as such is unconstitutional, and the court is bound to disregard it, whatever may be the hard necessity which, in the opinion of those who exercise the legislative powers of the State, appeared to require that they should come to the aid of their suffering fellow citizens. Fiat justitia, ruat coelum.

TOWNSEND v. TOWNSEND AND OTHERS (1 PECK'S, TENN. RPTS.)

Article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States was incorporated in that instrument to prevent a recurrence of the mischiefs arising from paper money and tender laws under the colonial government and up to the formation of the Federal Constitution. History of paper money and tender laws parallel between the present paper system and endorsement laws, and the system anterior to the formation of the Federal Constitution. The writ of execution, even considered as a new created right by which to enforce contracts, must not, under section 10, article I, of the Constitution, be so ordered on condition as to compel a creditor to lose his security to have the benefit thereof.

If the right to have execution was antecedent, suspension is an unconstitutional penalty; if newly created, the condition is unconstitutional and the right vests absolutely.

Law is the source of obligation, and the law at the time defines the extent of it; if the law in being at the time a contract is made gives an equivalent in money and a subsequent law provides that the equivalent shall not be in money, such law would impair the obligation of the contract; so, if a law at the date of a contract give immediate execution on a judgment and a subsequent law suspend it for 2 years, the contract is impaired. The regulation of contracts by law must go before, not after, such contracts are made. The mode of redress may be altered, but, as regards antecedent contracts, must not be rendered less efficacious than was the law when the contract was made.

Our Constitution, article II, section 7, "all courts shall be open", etc., relates to every possible injury a man may sustain, and includes the right to demand execution of a contract; to withhold performance is an injury to him in his goods and chattels, for he shall have "right and justice without sale, denial, or delay."

In Magna Carta this operates on royal power; in our country on legislative and every other power; every legislature and court is bound to say "let right and justice be administered without sale, denial, or delay." Justice is the end and right the mean whereby we may attain the end, which is the law. The mean is original and judicial process, and these must go, when demanded, without sale, denial, or delay. Therefore, the act of 1819, chapter 19, suspending the execution upon all judgments thereafter to be obtained for 2 years, unless the plaintiff will endorse that bank notes will be received in discharge, is unconstitutional and void.

The act of 1819, chapter 19, directs that upon any judgment thereafter to be obtained, execution shall not issue until 2 years after the rendition of such judgment, unless the plaintiff shall endorse upon the execution, that the sheriff or other officer shall and may receive, in satisfaction of said execution, notes on the State bank of Tennessee and its branches, and the Nashville bank and branches, or any of them, and such other notes as pass at par with them, etc.

The same or a similar provision is made by a law of 1820 for forming a new bank and for loaning out the moneys that it may issue. These acts of the legislature are urged to be unconstitutional and void. And various clauses of the State constitution and of the Constitution of the United States are said to be in direct repugnance to these acts; and if so, it is well to admit in the outset that the acts, like every other act whose basis is authority, are void if the authority be not given. We will take up these several clauses one after another and examine each in its turn to discover whether the acts in question are really unconstitutional as they are alleged to be.

First, then, let us take into consideration article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States, "No State shall, etc., emit bills of credit or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any, etc., ex post facto law or law impairing the obligation of contracts", etc. The two first sentences respect tender laws and paper money; the construction to be put on them should repress and prevent the evils they were intended to obviate; and what these are must be understood by the actual evils which paper money and tender laws produced in the time of the Colonial governments in time of the War of the Revolution and after that war, before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; and also by the effects which these clauses produced after the adoption of the Constitution; and then by considering what will be the effect of the act of assembly now under contemplation, should the same be deemed valid, we shall be able to discover whether these effects are the ones intended to be prevented by the clauses of the Constitution in question.

What, then, is the history of paper money and tender laws under the Colonial governments? North Carolina issued paper money, in 1713, £8,000, and the money depreciated. The lords proprietors would not receive it for quit rents, though issued to defray the expenses of the Tuscarora War. It could not be remitted to England, they said; at the same time peltry was received by them. The next North Carolina emission was in 1722, £1,200; the next in 1729, £40,000; the next in 1734, £1,000; Treasury notes in 1756, 1757, 1758, and 1759; one emission in 1760, of £12,000; one in 1761, of £20,000; one in 1771, of £60,000, to defray the expenses of suppressing the regulators. At this time there was already afloat £75,000. In 1729 the money depreciated and could never be raised to its original value. In 1730 the depreciation was three and a half for one; in 1735 it was five for one; in 1739 it was seven and a half for one; in 1740 it was received in payment for taxes, at the rate of seven and a half for one, and thus the Government redeemed and got clear of it. The Treasury notes depreciated. There is no instance of paper money which did not depreciate, let the plan for sustaining its credit be of whatever description it might. Paper money, in the time of the Colonial governments, was issued in most of the provinces, and in some of them depreciated more than it did in North Carolina.

The attempt was made in Massachusetts to issue bank bills, loaning them out on interest and on real and personal security, to be redeemed gradually, by the payment from the borrowers of one twelfth, making the bills a tender, and the refusal of them, to incur the loss of the debt. These provisions did not delay the depreciation for one instant. The rate of exchange in the first year was 150 and in the second 200 percent. In 1729 Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut had issued paper money. It depreciated. There was an immense quantity afloat; but the people still clamored for more. Massachusetts and New Hampshire were restrained from further emissions by royal instructions to the governors. Rhode Island could not be restrained, because she chose her own governor; and she issued £100,000. It instantly depreciated from 19 to 27 shillings per ounce silver, the former being the settled value, before the emission.

In 1741, in Massachusetts, the paper money being about to be redeemed by gold and silver, remitted from England to reimburse the Colonies for the exertions made in the late war above her quota, an apprehension of the scarcity of money and consequent distress of individuals, excited a great uneasiness in the colony; a bank was forthwith proposed to supply the place of the paper money thus to be redeemed. Every borrower was to mortgage a real estate in proportion to the sums he should take from the bank, or at his option, give personal security when the sum should exceed £100, to pay annually 3 percent on the sum borrowed, and 4 percent of the principal. To prevent the general confusion which was anticipated from this institution, the Parliament interfered and suppressed the company. The Massachusetts currency was redeemed at the rate of 50 shillings per ounce of silver, instead of 19 shillings per ounce, the rate at which it was issued. At this time, the popular leaders were using their best endeavors to make further emissions. In 1722, Pennsylvania issued paper money accompanied with penalties, enacted against those who made any difference in the price of their goods, when sold for paper and when sold for gold and silver. Notwithstanding this regulation, £130 of the paper was only equal in the course of exchange with Great Britain to £100 sterling, and in some of the Colonies, £100 sterling was equal in value to £1,100 currency. Such was the state of the currency before the Revolution. During the Revolutionary War, emissions were made from time to time. Depreciation began in March 1777, at one and a quarter for one, and progressed to January 1782, when it was 800 for one; and as if ashamed of their own loss of credit, the notes silently withdrew from circulation.

After the war of the Revolution was ended in 1783, the Assembly emitted in North Carolina £100,000, and in 1785, they made another emission to the same amount. The uniform fate of these emissions was depreciation. The emission of 1783, in North Carolina depreciated from 8 to 10 shillings, and then 12 shillings per dollar. The new emission of 1785 still further depreciated to 14, 15, and 16 shillings per dollar, instead of continuing at 8 shillings per dollar; but returned and settled at 10 on the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1789, and so it has ever since remained. In the debates in the convention of North Carolina upon the paper money and tender laws, it was stated that paper in Rhode Island had depreciated eight for one, and 100 percent, or 16 shillings per dollar in North Carolina. It was also stated that Pennsylvania had issued paper money but had not made it a tender, that in South Carolina their bills were a tender, as was also the paper money in Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and North Carolina. It was further stated that in South Carolina laws had been passed to pay debts with land, and, from calling them pine barrens, it is implied with such land as the debtor might choose to offer. And further, it was stated, that they had ordered debts to be paid by installments.

One cause of depreciation is that the paper could not be remitted to foreign countries. No matter how small the emission may be, it is not equal to gold and silver. He who exchanges it for gold and silver must give a greater quantity of paper. The expense of searching for and finding the silver, of procuring the exchange, and of getting it to the place of exportation, together with the risk of conveyance and the greater danger of having the paper money counterfeited, are all considered and involved in fixing the difference of value and contribute to the increase of depreciation. If the paper money cannot be redeemed till some years hence, that becomes another cause of depreciation. It may be alleviated by an accrual of interest for the delay, but it will nevertheless depreciate from this cause in conjunction with others. One hundred pounds in gold and silver is better than £100 bearing interest payable at the end of 10 years, although it will then be certainly paid: Because a present and pressing demand which cannot be extinguished but by gold and silver makes it eligible sometimes to give a greater premium than the interest rather than abide the consequences of nonpayment. And it will take the notes and a premium besides to procure the £100 which perhaps a merchant wants to pay a foreign creditor who has called for payment.

Another cause of depreciation is the power in the legislature to repeat emissions at pleasure. For hence arises the just apprehension that repeated emissions will be resorted to. Experience proves that paper money will be issued whenever the cry can be raised of general and public distress and can cause an application to be made for relief.

With respect to the disorders produced by paper money and tender laws, both theory and experience present them to view. Who will be so imprudent as to give credit to the citizens of a State that makes paper money a tender and where he can be told, take for a gold and silver debt depreciated paper, depreciating still more in the moment it is paid? Who would trust the value of his property to the citizens of another State or of his own State who can be protected by law against the just demands of creditors by forcing them to receive depreciated paper or to be delayed of payment from year to year until the legislature will no longer interfere? Had he not better go to other markets beyond the limits of the State to dispose of his surplus productions? Or had he not better refrain from making any such surplus productions rather than be compelled to receive from the purchasers of them less than one half the value agreed to be paid for them? Had he not better remove to another country where good faith is preserved, with all his property, and there accumulate the rewards of his industry rather than be continually deprived of a great part of them here to suit the convenience of the purchaser? Would it not be better for a foreign state whose citizens are thus injured to use violence and make reprisals rather than suffer such injustice?

If such are the evils which theory would lead us to anticipate, they are not less formidable under the test of experience. Depreciated paper prevented equal contributions from the States to the general expenses of the Nation. New York, for instance, had emitted bills of credit. In them her quota was payable, and by depreciation of inferior value to the quota of other States where money was not depreciated, though the quotas of the latter were of much smaller denomination. Impressions had been made on the public morals by depreciated paper. Purchasers on credit had derived great gains from depreciation, extensive purchases had been made, and at length the hopes of the purchasers were disappointed and great numbers of the people were found to owe debts, which they were unable to pay; a general discontent ensued with the course of trade, petitions were made for relief; embarrassments daily became more extensive, and two parties were formed. One struggling for the observance of public and private engagements and for the relief of individual distress, they urged recourse to frugality and industry, and that the idle should not be protected by the legislature from the consequence of their indiscretion and should be restrained from involving themselves in difficulties by the conviction that a rigid compliance with contracts would be enforced. This party was for enlarging the powers of Congress to effectuate these ends.

The other party pressed for indulgence to debtors and for less rigor in the exact execution of contracts; for relaxing the administration of justice; for affording facilities for the payment of debts; for suspending the collection of them, and was opposed to any concession of power to Congress which might prove hostile to these views. Wherever this party prevailed, paper money was emitted, the delay of legal proceedings was tolerated, suspensions of collecting took place. Where this party had not yet prevailed, the dread of getting the superiority greatly affected the fortunes of a very considerable portion of the community. This uncertainty aided in promoting pecuniary embarrassments, which at the time influenced almost all the legislatures of the Union. Public and private confidence was lost; the public debts due to individuals everywhere depreciated. In private transactions an astonishing degree of distrust prevailed. The bonds of solvent men could not be negotiated, but at a discount of 30, 40, or 50 percent. Real property was scarcely vendible. Sales of any article for ready money could not be made but at a ruinous loss. The debtor class of society might prove successful at elections, and instead of paying by the fruits of industry and economy might be relieved by legislative interference. National wealth and national labor dwindled. Everywhere it was found that the people could not pay their debts. In some instances threats were used of suspending the administration of justice by private violence (5th vol. of the Life of Washington, pp. 85–89).

Amongst the various measures proposed for the removal of this gloomy state of things, a general convention to revise the circumstances of the union was one, and it succeeded. In Massachusetts, a short time before, the utmost distraction reigned. The mob required an abatement of the compensation promised to the officers of the Army, a cessation of taxes and of the administration of justice; they required the circulation of depreciated paper and a relief from public and private burdens. They threatened lawyers and courts, arrested the course of law, and restrained the judges from doing their duty.

Rhode Island, a paper-moneyed State, would not send deputies to the Convention, and North Carolina long hesitated in acceding to the Federal Constitution. Such were the unpromising circumstances which America had to deplore; and such the alarming disorders which were to be remedied by the Convention. One of the most powerful remedies was the tenth clause of the first article, and particularly the two sentences which we are now considering. They operated most efficaciously. The new course of thinking, which had been inspired by the adoption of a constitution that was understood to prohibit all laws for the emission of paper money and for the making anything a tender but gold and silver, restored the confidence which was so essential to the internal prosperity of nations.

There was a great and visible improvement in the circumstances of the people. Conviction was impressed upon debtors that personal exertion alone could save them from embarrassment. An increased degree of industry and economy was the natural consequence of such an opinion. These clauses, as they were not only necessary for the regulation of intercourse between the State and State, and the citizens of each, to prevent the misunderstandings which were likely to arise from the prohibited causes, are equally so for regulating the intercourse of citizens of the same State with each other, were therefore considered as a fundamental law of the Union and also a part of the constitution of each State. What was it to the State of Vermont if Georgia should pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder which could operate only upon those within her own territory? The restriction was imposed upon Georgia not for the sake of the people of Vermont but for the benefit of Georgia and for fear of the tyranny which her own legislature, at some future time, might be tempted to exercise. A law, impairing the obligation of contracts, as it was equally injurious to citizens of the same State as to foreigners and citizens of other States, is equally prohibited as to all, and is not restrictive of State legislation only so far as regards citizens of other States.

The constitutions of the several States had left the power unlimited in their State legislatures. The framers of the Federal Constitution believed it to be of indispensable importance not to leave this power any longer in the hands of the State legislatures. Experience had demonstrated the baneful effects of its exercise. The known disposition of man excluded the hope that it would not be used for the same pernicious purposes in future. Under the smart of this experience, such were the feelings of the American people at the time, still suffering under repeated emissions of depreciated paper, that not a dissenting voice was raised against the clause before us. No State required it to be expunged, nor did any State propose an amendment. It was universally received without an exception, and the effects of the clauses themselves were miraculous. Public and private confidence took deep root. The people of America were reinstated in the admiration of the world. The precious metals flowed in upon them. Paper money suddenly stopped in its career of depreciation and took a stand from which it never departed; industry revived universally; and to us in America was given a notable proof that whenever a nation is virtuous and honest it will prosper both in wealth and character, and that whenever a contrary course is pursued, such is the wise decree of Providence, that prosperity of either kind will not long follow in her train.

Do these acts of our legislature revive any of the recited mischiefs? If they are valid, what is there to distinguish our present situation from that which preceded the Federal Constitution? Can our legislature emit paper money and give credit to it by promising redemption by taxes and public property? Will not such money depreciate? Cannot the legislature to every real purpose make it a tender? And will not all the consequences ensue, which followed the like causes heretofore—payment of debts with depreciated paper, the dismissal of self-condemnation for unfaithfulness in contracts, a dereliction of industrious efforts, facility in the assumption of debts, a thirst for more paper, public inquietude under the ravages of speculation, indifference if not dislike to the Government, loss of public and private credit, the transportation of our commodities to countries where the money is not degraded, the removal of our capital thither, the cessation of active labor, the decrease of national wealth, poverty, embarrassment, open resistance to the laws, and a general cry, as from a sinking ship, of save us! save us!

Part of the loss by depreciation falls upon every man through whose hand the money passes, and to avoid the loss as much as possible, every holder makes haste to get rid of it and makes some sacrifice to do so. Those to whom debts are due, become debtors to an equal amount, to the end that what is lost by depreciation for debts due to them, may be saved by the depreciation of debts due from them. Many who are not debtors immediately become such by the purchase of property to as great an amount as possible, that they may gain as much in value as the sum to be paid to them loses in value by depreciation. Debts instead of being extinguished are multiplied, and the way is prepared for further emissions. Those who become creditors, knowing the risks they run, will have such advanced prices as will be a probable indemnification against them. A small number of credits amount to immense sums, and the thirst for paper money increasing with the means taken to allay it, new debtors clamor for more paper. Wanting means, and laboring under the disadvantages inseparably incident to the paper-money system, no State, however, blessed by nature, can attain prosperity. Embarrassments incessantly multiply; and for discharging debts without paying them, the country must be visited with misfortunes which no country can bear.

The injuries inflicted upon sister States will not be endured. The creditors there, when the attempt is made to pay gold and silver debts with depreciated paper, will seek redress; should the Constitution and laws of the Union be found inadequate to afford it, the legislature of their own State will look to its strength and to the dissolution of a compact, which instead of procuring justice to the citizens, excludes them from it. Should the disappointed creditor be a foreigner, after remonstrance to the head of the Union and the development of its incompetency, he will appeal to his own government and force will be resorted to. The whole Union becomes exposed for the injustice of one State, and will be disposed to leave it to suffer for its own misconduct rather than be responsible themselves for that which they cannot prevent. In either alternative, disunion is the end. On the contrary, if the Constitution and laws of the Union make void such act of the legislature, and we deem them valid, the debtor in this State will be found to pay gold and silver to his creditor who lives out of the State; when, at the same time, his debtor within the State, who owes an equal amount, will pay in depreciated paper, perhaps of not half the value; and thus, one debtor residing within the State will be ruined by the legalized unfaithfulness of another. And in our State courts, the same words in the same clause mean one thing; but in the Federal court, another. When part of the citizens are thus sacrificed to suit the convenience of another part, and when such sacrifices become habitual by the frequent exercise of a power, which never lies dormant, after the acknowledgment of its existence, it will not be long before the persecuted portion will seek exemption from the wrongs it endures. Such are the tendencies which the Convention meant to eradicate. Acts generative of such tendencies are adverse to the spirit of this clause, and there is a repugnance between them and the Constitution.

We come now to a more minute examination of the acts in question. The creditor is denied execution for 2 years, unless he agrees to take paper. What the debtor cannot tender, the creditor is not bound to receive. Whatever he is not bound to receive, he cannot be punished for refusing. The accessory is prohibited as well as the principal. Here the tender is not directly sanctioned. It is only said to the creditor, "If you will not take paper, give up the means of getting anything at all for 2 years, with the prospect of still longer delay by repeated acts of the legislature. Take this paper which I have no right to impose upon you, or give up a right which I have no authority to take from you." Suspension of execution is a penalty, if, but for the act, the creditor would be entitled to it as a right attached to his antecedent contract, and it is a penalty prohibited by the tenth section now under consideration. If the legislature has power at this day to enact a suspension of execution for refusing to take paper, that section is abrogated. Two years may be extended to a hundred, and where is the difference between a direct injunction to take paper and the injunction to wait 100 years, if he will not take it? Grant, for argument sake, that the right to execution is not an antecedent right, attached to the contract, but a newly created one, given by the legislature only upon condition. Shall it be permitted so to frame the condition as to make it involve the relinquishment of a right secured by the Constitution? By the latter the creditor is secured against paper money. Can he be required to relinquish that security in order that he may become entitled to the benefit of this newly created right, to have execution? By such inventions every constitutional right may in succession be bartered away. Constitutional rights are vested, unexchangeable, and inalienable. They belong to posterity as well as to the present generation. We may use and enjoy, but not transfer them; and every such condition is utterly void. If execution can be suspended on any condition, then the legislature has an absolute power to suspend it forever. How easy it is to invent a thousand conditions with which no man in his senses would comply! If the right is newly created, and the condition void, it must vest without the performance of the condition; and the result is that, if the right be antecedent, suspension is an unconstitutional penalty; if it be newly created, the condition is unconstitutional and the right vests absolutely. In either alternative, the endorsement need not be made.

This conclusion follows upon a correct interpretation of the clause prohibiting tender laws. It equally follows a just interpretation of the sentence prohibiting laws to impair the obligation of contracts, contained in article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States; and in article 11, section 20, of our Bill of Rights. A grant made by the State, being an executed contract, cannot be revoked by the legislature if pursuant to a law made by themselves; this point is so decided in Fletcher v. Peck. With respect to executory contracts, it will be admitted without controversy that the terms and conditions of them cannot be in any respect altered or interfered with by the legislature.

The time, place, person, or thing to be done cannot be changed by act of assembly. Covenants sometimes by ex post facto circumstances become unreasonably burthensome. He that covenants to pay rent for premises he never enjoys by the accidental burning of them must nevertheless pay the rent. A man agrees to perform a voyage by sea under a penalty by way of stated damages for noncompliance, and he is hindered from an exact compliance by adverse winds; still he must pay the penalty. In these and all other cases of contract, the legislature cannot interfere to make them more just or reasonable than the parties have made them. For thus no contract could be made that the parties might depend on for fear of the new modeling interposition of the legislature. Thus far is plain; but still the question remains, Is the suspension of execution within the prohibition? Does an act to suspend execution impair the obligation of contracts made before it? What the obligation of a contract is may be discerned by considering what it is that makes the obligation. The contract alone has not any legal obligation, and why? Because there is no law to enforce it. The contract is made by the parties, and if sanctioned by law, it promises to enforce performance should the party decline performance himself. The law is the source of the obligation, and the extent of the obligation is defined by the law in use at the time the contract is made. If this law direct a specific execution, and a subsequent act declare that there shall not be a specific execution, the obligation of the contract is lessened and impaired. If the law in being at the date of the contract give an equivalent in money, and a subsequent law say the equivalent should not be in money, such act would impair the obligation of the contract.

If the law in being at the date of the contract give immediate execution on the rendition of the judgment, a subsequent act, declaring that the execution should not issue for 2 years, would lessen or impair the contract equally as much in principle as if it suspended execution forever; in which latter case, the legal obligation of the contract would be wholly extinguished. The legislature may alter remedies; but they must not, so far as regards antecedent contracts, be rendered less efficacious or more dilatory than those ordained by the law in being when the contract was made, if such alteration be the direct and special object of the legislature, apparent in an act made for the purpose. Though possibly, if such alteration were the consequence of a general law and merely incidental to it, which law had not the alteration for its object, it might not be subject to the imputation of constitutional repugnance. The legislature may regulate contracts of all sorts but the regulation must be before, not after, the time when the contracts are made.

Our State constitution, article 11, section 7, ordains, "that all courts shall be open, and every man for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial, or delay." This clause relates to every possible injury which a man may sustain and which affects him in respect to his real or personal property, or in respect to his person or reputation, and includes the right which is vested in him to demand the execution of a contract; which being a personal right to a chattel, is when performance is denied or withheld, an injury to him in his goods or chattels. And with respect to it, right and justice is to be done, without sale, denial, or delay. In Magna Carta, this restriction is upon royal power; in our country it is upon legislative, and all other power. We must understand the meaning of that, notwithstanding any act of the legislature to the contrary, every man shall have "right and justice" in all cases "without sale, denial, or delay."

In 1796, when the Constitution was formed, it could not have been apprehended that any other department of government, except that of the legislature, would ever have weight enough to offer any obstruction. Experience from 1777 had fully demonstrated the imbecility of every executive office in the United States. From the executive no such offer could be anticipated. In 2d institute, 55, my lord Coke says, the king is the speaker, and in contemplation of law is constantly present in all his courts, pronouncing the words of Magna Carta "Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus justitiam vel rectum." In Tennessee every legislature is in contemplation of law during the whole session, and the judge of every court during the whole term, in the constant repetition of the words "right and justice", must be "administered without sale, denial, or delay." In 2d institute, 56, justice is said to be the end and right the means whereby we may attain the end, and that is the law. What that means consists in is more specially explained in Sullivan, 523, where it is stated to be original and judicial process. Original process, he says, must issue without price, except that which the law fixes, and without denial, though the defendant be a favorite of the king or government, who interferes in his behalf, and must be proceeded on by the judges, after suit instituted upon it, without delay, themselves or by order of the king, or, as we say, act of the legislature. And the judges where the causes depend must issue the proper judicial process, without fee or reward, except that fixed by law. In other words, where judgment is rendered the judges shall cause execution to issue, notwithstanding any order or act of assembly or other pretended authority whatsoever.

This is the long-fixed, well-known meaning and legal construction of the words "right and justice without sale, denial, or delay." They clearly comprehend the case of executions suspended by act of the legislature in every instance where justice requires that it should immediately issue, as it manifestly does where the law, operating upon the contract when first made, held out to the creditor the promise of immediate execution after judgment.

* * * * * * *

The result, then, of the investigation we have made is this, that suspension of execution as directed by these acts of the legislature now under consideration, is forbidden by the prohibition of tender laws, as a direct consequence of the prohibition; also, by the interdiction to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, suspension or execution being an impairing of such obligation; and furthermore, by the declaration that justice and right shall be done, without delay in all cases, the process of execution being one sense of the term right, which is not to be delayed.

We are, therefore, bound to say that these acts are repugnant to the Constitution and void, so far as relates to the suspension of execution; and that execution ought to issue immediately without any such endorsement as the act requires. The judicial tribunals of the country must refuse sanction to acts which are to be executed through their agency, such as an act of suspension of execution is, which cannot take place without the assent of the court. There are some violations, which need not their instrumentality, and, of course, cannot meet their rejection, and which alone the great body of the people must correct. An occlusion of the courts of justice would be one of them. The courts cannot sit but on the days appointed by the legislature; and in that and other instances, the court having no agency, would have no responsibility. Wherever their cooperation is unconstitutionally required, it is the most sacred of all their duties to withhold it, and whenever they are found to want firmness to do so, the Constitution and public freedom die together.

TAXATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the votes by which House bill 6131 was ordered to a third reading and passed on yesterday be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HEBERT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Costigan	King	Russell
Austin	Cutting	La Follette	Schall
Bachman	Davis	Lewis	Sheppard
Bailey	Dickinson	Logan	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lonergan	Smith
Barbour	Erickson	McAdoo	Steiwer
Barkley	Fess	McCarran	Stephens
Bone	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Glass	Murphy	Thompson
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Neely	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Norris	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Nye	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	O'Mahoney	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Overton	Wagner
Caraway	Hatch	Patterson	Walsh
Carey	Hatfield	Pittman	Wheeler
Clark	Hayden	Pope
Connally	Hebert	Reynolds
Coolidge	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is detained in a meeting of the special committee of the Senate to investigate ocean and air mail contracts.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is detained on departmental matters; also, that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is necessarily detained in connection with relief matters for his State; and that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is temporarily absent attending to matters of importance in connection with his State.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL] is detained on important departmental matters.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily absent from the Senate: The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. In the rear of the Chamber we were unable to hear the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi is that the Senate reconsider the votes by which it ordered to a third reading and passed House bill 6131.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the bill having passed and conferees having been appointed, the motion to reconsider comes too late.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The attention of the Chair has been called to that suggested point of order.

It seems to the Chair that the philosophy of the rule is that, the bill having been sent to conference, a revocation of the action of the Senate would suspend the action of the conferees.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. If the Chair so rules, I move to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is detained in a meeting of the special committee of the Senate to investigate ocean and air mail contracts.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is detained on departmental matters; also, that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is necessarily detained in connection with relief matters for his State; and that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is temporarily absent attending to matters of importance in connection with his State.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are detained on important departmental matters.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has been called to the White House, and is unable to be present on this vote.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—28

Barbour	Davis	Hebert	Patterson
Bone	Dickinson	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Borah	Fess	McAdoo	Russell
Capper	Frazier	McCarran	Schall
Caraway	Goldsborough	McNary	Shipstead
Carey	Hastings	Norris	Steiwer
Clark	Hatfield	Nye	Vandenberg

NAYS—45

Adams	Cutting	Lonergan	Thomas, Okla.
Ashurst	Dieterich	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Austin	Fletcher	Murphy	Thompson
Bailey	Gore	Neely	Trammell
Bankhead	Hale	O'Mahoney	Tydings
Barkley	Harrison	Overton	Van Nuys
Bulkley	Hatch	Pittman	Wagner
Byrd	Hayden	Reynolds	Walsh
Byrnes	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.	Wheeler
Connally	King	Sheppard
Coolidge	La Follette	Smith
Costigan	Logan	Stephens

NOT VOTING—23

Bachman	Dill	Kean	Pope
Black	Duffy	Lewis	Reed
Brown	Erickson	Long	Townsend
Bulow	George	McGill	Walcott
Copeland	Gibson	Metcalf	White
Couzens	Glass	Norbeck

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. HARRISON's motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to reconsider the votes by which the Senate ordered to a third reading and passed House bill 6131.

Mr. CLARK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea".

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily absent: Mr. GIBSON, Mr. METCALF, Mr. KEAN, Mr. NORBECK, Mr. REED, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. WHITE.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is detained in a meeting of a special committee of the Senate to investigate ocean and air mail contracts.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is detained on departmental matters; also that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is necessarily detained in connection with relief matters for his State, and that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is temporarily absent attending to matters of importance in connection with his State.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are detained on important departmental matters.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has been called to the White House and is unable to be present on this vote.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—43

Adams	Cutting	Logan	Smith
Ashurst	Dieterich	Lonergan	Stephens
Austin	Fletcher	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bailey	Glass	Murphy	Thomas, Utah
Bankhead	Gore	Neely	Thompson
Barkley	Hale	O'Mahoney	Trammell
Bulkley	Harrison	Overton	Tydings
Byrd	Hatch	Pittman	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Hayden	Reynolds	Wagner
Coolidge	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.	Walsh
Costigan	King	Sheppard

NAYS—30

Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Russell
Borah	Fess	McAdoo	Schall
Capper	Frazier	McCarran	Shipstead
Caraway	Goldsborough	McNary	Steiwer
Carey	Hastings	Norris	Vandenberg
Clark	Hatfield	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Hebert	Patterson
Davis	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

NOT VOTING—23

Bachman	Couzens	Kean	Pope
Black	Dill	Lewis	Reed
Bone	Duffy	Long	Townsend
Brown	Erickson	McGill	Walcott
Bulow	George	Metcalf	White
Copeland	Gibson	Norbeck

So Mr. HARRISON's motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having voted to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, the bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, on the roll call on the second amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], relating to section 13 of House bill 6131, I voted in the affirmative. Inquiries since having convinced me that the amendment would tie the hands of the administration in negotiating reciprocity agreements, I desire now to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, that motion is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is debatable.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I merely desire to state that on yesterday during the debate it occurred to me that there might be a conflict between this piece of legislation and the authority already granted to the President to bargain or deal in quotas with foreign countries. The matter did not come up yesterday in the debate, and I thought this matter ought to go to conference, where that part of it could be threshed out, to have the matter cleared up.

Certainly if the desire is to be able to use the power already granted to the President to facilitate the exportation of American products in return for quotas on liquor, that is an important matter, but on the spur of the moment, without having knowledge as to how it will affect the Executive power, I thought the matter ought to go to conference, where it could be discussed and properly weighed, to see whether it would have the ill effect we were told it would have. I still think it ought to go to conference and will vote to send it there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] that the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], on page 8, after line 17, was agreed to, be reconsidered.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I make the same statement I made on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is detained in a meeting of a special committee of the Senate to investigate ocean and air mail contracts.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is detained on departmental matters; also that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is necessarily detained in connection with relief matters for his State, and that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is temporarily absent attending to matters of importance in connection with his State.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are detained on important departmental matters.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has been called to the White House and is unable to be present on this vote.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—44

Adams	Cutting	Logan	Sheppard
Ashurst	Dieterich	Lonergan	Smith
Austin	Fletcher	McKellar	Stephens
Bailey	Glass	Murphy	Thomas, Okla.
Bankhead	Gore	Neely	Thomas, Utah
Barkley	Hale	O'Mahoney	Thompson
Bulkley	Harrison	Overton	Trammell
Byrd	Hatch	Pittman	Tydings
Byrnes	Hayden	Pope	Van Nuys
Coolidge	Keyes	Reynolds	Wagner
Costigan	King	Robinson, Ark.	Walsh

NAYS—31

Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Borah	Fess	Lewis	Russell
Capper	Frazier	McAdoo	Schall
Caraway	Goldsborough	McCarran	Shipstead
Carey	Hastings	McNary	Steiwer
Clark	Hatfield	Norris	Vandenberg
Connally	Hebert	Nye	Wheeler
Davis	Johnson	Patterson

NOT VOTING—21

Bachman	Couzens	Kean	Townsend
Black	Dill	Long	Walcott
Bone	Duffy	McGill	White
Brown	Erickson	Metcalf
Bulow	George	Norbeck
Copeland	Gibson	Reed

So Mr. MURPHY's motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON]. Not knowing how he would vote upon this question, I withhold my vote.

I will further say that I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] was called back to the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, on official business. I report his absence, as I have been requested to do.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I make the same statement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Repeating my previous announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CAREY. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily absent from the Senate:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is detained in a meeting of a special committee of the Senate to investigate ocean and air mail contracts.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is detained on departmental matters, and that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is temporarily absent attending to matters of importance in connection with his State.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] are detained on important departmental matters.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has been called to the White House and is unable to be present on this vote.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—30

Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Russell
Borah	Fess	McAdoo	Schall
Capper	Frazier	McCarran	Shipstead
Caraway	Goldsborough	McNary	Steiwer
Carey	Hastings	Norris	Vandenberg
Clark	Hatfield	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Hebert	Patterson
Davis	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

NAYS—44

Adams	Dieterich	Logan	Sheppard
Ashurst	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith
Austin	Fletcher	McKellar	Stephens
Bailey	Glass	Murphy	Thomas, Okla.
Bankhead	Gore	Neely	Thomas, Utah
Barkley	Hale	O'Mahoney	Thompson
Byrd	Harrison	Overton	Trammell
Byrnes	Hatch	Pittman	Tydings
Coolidge	Hayden	Pope	Van Nuys
Costigan	Keyes	Reynolds	Wagner
Cutting	King	Robinson, Ark.	Walsh

NOT VOTING—22

Bachman	Copeland	Kean	Reed
Black	Couzens	Lewis	Townsend
Bone	Dill	Long	Walcott
Brown	Erickson	McGill	White
Bulkley	George	Metcalf
Bulow	Gibson	Norbeck

So Mr. CLARK's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be read a third time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the order entered yesterday asking for a conference with the House on the bill and amendments and appointing of conferees be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is rescinded.

OHIO FALLS PROJECT—OPINION OF FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have here an opinion rendered by the Federal Power Commission, delivered by its chairman, in the matter of determination of actual legitimate original cost of Ohio Falls project no. 289, Kentucky, and also an editorial printed in the Washington Herald, December 20, 1933, entitled "Curbing the Power Trust", on the same subject. I ask that they may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the opinion and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
Washington.

OPINION NO. 11, OCTOBER 31, 1933

LOUISVILLE HYDRO-ELECTRIC CO., LICENSEE

In the matter of: Determination of actual legitimate original cost of Ohio Falls project no. 289, Kentucky—opinion:

Syllabus

1. A contract for exclusive construction and other services by the service company of a system to a public utility, both under common control, involves one of the most obnoxious practices of the holding company device, and the Federal Power Commission, in determining the cost of a licensed project, must closely scrutinize such contract and the conditions under which it was made.

2. Where there is common control of the service company and the operating company, the two being virtually departments of an integrated system, with the power implicit therein arbitrarily to dictate contracts and fix charges for services, the Commission must disregard the contract and demand evidence of the cost to the service company of the services rendered. Under the Federal Water Power Act the allowable cost to the licensee for construction and other service can be no more than the cost of such service to the service company under common control with licensee.

3. The Federal Water Power Act forbids the Commission to allow other than actual legitimate original cost of the construction of the project. The cost must be (1) actual, that is, real and bona fide, as distinguished from fictitious or fabricated, whether by intercorporate dealings or otherwise; and (2) legitimate, meaning not coerced, collusive, fraudulent, or unreasonable; and (3) original, as excluding elements of subsequent enhancement, profit, or accretion.

4. Where there is common control it is not sufficient to show that the prices for services are no higher than obtainable elsewhere, but the burden is upon the licensee to show the actual cost to the service company. And having, by intercorporate contract, destroyed the open market, licensee cannot appeal to the standard of the open market by which to measure the value of the services rendered in a closed market. Furthermore, in determining the cost of services, the market value of such services does not measure their cost within the meaning of the Federal Water Power Act.

5. Where the majority interest imposes a monopolistic service contract on a licensee through system control, it has no right to complain that the minority shares in the alleged economies which result from such involuntary servitude of the minority interests.

6. Officers of a public utility corporation who are at the same time officers of a private service corporation are under the duty, when acting in such dual capacities, in the making of a service contract, to discharge the primary obligation they owe as trustees or agents of the consuming public. They are forbidden, by law, to negotiate or consent to an intercorporate contract imposing unnecessary costs upon the utility, carrying a profit to the private corporation in which they may participate as officers, stockholders, or otherwise.

7. It is the duty of the licensee to keep its accounts in conformity to the Commission's accounting rules and if failure to do so makes it impossible to furnish evidence of cost, such failure to obey the law is not a satisfactory answer to the plain requirement of the statute.

8. The burden is upon licensee to furnish satisfactory evidence from which the actual cost can be ascertained, and the results of an audit made by the Federal Trade Commission for another purpose, and upon other principles, is not acceptable as a substitute.

9. In determining the cost of services rendered by a private service company to the licensee, a public utility, both being under common control, the Commission should have submitted to it satisfactory evidence as to all elements of cost, including salaries paid, and bonuses, if any, to the officers and directors of the service company, and also to show whether there was any duplication of such payments to individuals serving as officers of both companies.

10. Money paid by licensee under a contract between it and an affiliated construction company to guarantee the latter a percentage fee and to reimburse for a loss sustained under a contract with the Government for the construction of a dam, which is not a part of the project works, is not a proper part of the cost of the licensed power project.

11. The evidence of alleged benefits to licensee offered in justification of its claim for reimbursement of an affiliated service company for loss on a Government dam is too conjectural and speculative, as the Commission cannot appraise the value of things which might conceivably have happened under circumstances which could have existed, but did not.

12. The date when the project is available for operation is the date when in the course of due diligence the project has been sufficiently completed to be reasonably reliable and available for service.

13. Interest at the rate of 6 percent is allowable on construction costs during the construction period, under the circumstances shown in this case.

14. Attorneys' fees are allowable as a part of the cost of the project, but where the attorneys are the legal department of an affiliated service company having a contract with the licensee for construction and other services, fees for services rendered by the legal department at the home office must be disallowed, as they are provided for in the construction contract.

15. Expenditures for aeroplane photography and motion pictures of the project during various stages of its construction cannot be allowed as a part of the actual legitimate cost, since the benefit thereof to the particular project does not appear.

16. The cost of a banquet is not an appropriate or proper part of the cost of a public-utility project. To approve such an expenditure might open the door to good-will advertising at the cost of the consuming public.

17. The reasonable cost of an outdoor observation platform and salaries to guides for the protection of visitors are properly allowable as legitimate costs, since the licensee is under a duty to provide reasonable means for the protection of the public against injury.

18. Expenses for the convenience and entertainment of visitors, such as transportation, lunches, and soft drinks, are not allowable as costs of the project, as the licensee owed no such duty to visitors.

19. While licensee is entitled to a compensatory rental on its nonproject lands actually and necessarily used for construction purposes, it is not entitled to a rental above interest and carrying charges on its own lands used to construct its own project.

20. Expenses of employees of the construction company attending conventions are not allowable as a part of the cost of the licensee's project.

H. B. Teegarden, solicitor for the Commission.

McNinch, chairman: This case involves the determination of the cost of a hydroelectric project on the Ohio River in the city of Louisville, Ky. The preliminary permit was granted December 4, 1923, and the license was issued November 11, 1925, to the Louisville Hydro-Electric Co., a Delaware corporation, organized in 1922. The project consists of a power house and appurtenant equipment therein, at United States Dam No. 41, a substation and other works and facilities, including the necessary land.

In conformity to the Federal Water Power Act (41 Stat. 1063; U.S.C., title 16, secs. 791–823) the licensee filed a verified statement, in detail, of the cost of this project as of May 1, 1928, later adjusted to November 30, 1929. The total cost claimed is $7,829,738.72. Commission examiners, Harold Tomlin and Raymond M. Lindsay, audited the records of licensee and submitted a preliminary accounting report thereon which was examined and approved by the Commission's chief accountant, William V. King. This report recommended for allowance certain items of cost and suspended other items for adjustment or disallowance, after special consideration by the Commission. Under the Commission's rules of practice, a copy of this report was served upon licensee, which, in due time, filed its protest to the suspension of said items and requested a hearing thereon.

A hearing was held and upon the record, including the license and an amendment, statement of cost filed by licensee, preliminary accounting report, licensee's protest, such of the stipulations between the solicitor for the Commission and counsel for the licensee as were approved by the Commission, the evidence and exhibits introduced at the hearing, and briefs by counsel for licensee and by the solicitor, the Commission approves and allows $6,996,093.52 as the actual legitimate original cost of the project as of November 30, 1929, and rejects and disallows $833,645.20, the balance of the licensee's claim.

The Commission's allowances and disallowances of the numerous cost items appear in a separate order determining cost, but some of these items involving interpretations of the act and administrative policies require discussion.

FEE ON COST OF CONSTRUCTION

The licensee claims $481,533.48 as part of the cost of construction, representing a 7½-percent fee paid to the Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation (hereinafter referred to as the Byllesby Service Co.), under a contract for engineering, accounting, purchasing, and other services. The Commission has approved the reimbursement of the Byllesby Service Co., at cost, for direct services and purchases of materials, etc., as provided for in said contract.

(1) The question here at issue is the allowance of the 7½-percent fee as part of the actual legitimate original cost of the project. The decision of this question necessarily involves scrutiny of an intercorporate contract whereby the Byllesby Service Co., the service organization of the system, performed services for and received this flat percentage fee from the licensee, an affiliated company, both companies being under common control. This intercorporate service contract between the licensee, a public utility subject to regulation, and the Byllesby Service Co., a private corporation, not subject to regulation or any limitation on profits, presents one of the most insidious, grievous, and obnoxious practices of the holding company device or system. Such service charges demand searching inquiry of the conditions under which the contract was negotiated, and of profits resulting from such payments by one affiliate company to another, to prevent collusive inflation of the capital structure of the operating utility. Such inflation would be reflected in rates to consumers and would increase the recapture price to be paid for the project by the Federal Government, a State, or municipality, thus directly affecting the pubic interests which this Commission was created to protect.

The common control of the two parties to the contract is undisputed. These two companies are units in a great utility system[1] of which H. M. Byllesby Co. is the top holding company, controlling many other operating companies not directly involved in the instant case. This top holding company owns and controls the Standard Gas & Electric Co. (hereinafter called the Standard Co.), a subsidiary holding company; the Standard Co. owns all of the stock of and controls the Byllesby Service Co.; and also controls, indirectly, the licensee, through the Louisville Gas & Electric Co., of Delaware (distinct from another subsidiary of the same name, a Kentucky corporation), which in turn owns all of the stock of the licensee, the Louisville Hydro-Electric Co. The licensee further admits that it and the Byllesby Service Co. are dominated by common directors.

The Byllesby Service Co. is the managing, directing, constructing, and service agency of the entire Standard system. In 1925, when the contract was made under which the fee is claimed, nearly all of licensee company officers were also officers of the Standard Co., the Byllesby Service Co., and the said Louisville Gas & Electric Co.; and officers and directors of the Byllesby Service Co. constituted a majority of the directors of the other three companies. It is a telltale circumstance that M. A. Morrison, who, as vice president for the Byllesby Service Co. executed the fee contract under consideration, was at the time a director, assistant secretary, and assistant treasurer of the Louisville Hydro-Electric Co., licensee, and vice president and assistant secretary of its immediate owner, said Louisville Gas & Electric Co., and a director and secretary and treasurer of the Standard Co., which owned a majority of the stock of and controlled the Louisville Gas & Electric Co. Further, that Halfred Erickson, who executed the contract as vice president of the licensee company, was at the time a director and vice president of the Byllesby Service Co., the other party to the contract, and a director of each the Standard Co. and Louisville Gas & Electric Co. It is further noted that William C. Pohl who attested the contract, as assistant secretary for the Byllesby Service Co., was also assistant secretary and treasurer of the Standard Co.; and that Herbert List, who attested the contract as assistant secretary for the licensee company, held a corresponding position with each of the three other companies, including the other party to the contract, the Byllesby Service Co. Whatever else this may indicate, it must be granted that here is the maximum of convenience and simplicity in the negotiation and execution of contracts, assuming that each officer could remember the particular company for which he was acting.

The following chart, made from evidence of record, graphically shows the completeness and harmony of control:

Officer	Standard Gas & Electric Co.	Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation	Louisville Gas & Electric Co., Delaware	Louisville Hydro-Electric Co.
J. J. O'Brien	President	President	President	President.
R. J. Graff	Vice president	Vice president	Assistant secretary and assistant treasurer.	Assistant secretary and assistant treasurer.
Halfred Erickson	----------	do	Vice president	Vice president.
F. C. Gordon	Vice president	----------	do	do
George H. Harries	do	Vice president	----------
B. W. Lynch	do	do	Vice president and assistant treasurer.

Herbert List	Assistant secretary and assistant treasurer.	Assistant secretary and assistant treasurer.	Assistant secretary and assistant treasurer.	do
Wm. G. Pohl	do	Assistant secretary.	----------

The record also shows substantially the same condition as to common directorates, which authorized and later ratified the fee contract.

Upon these admitted facts there is no room for quibble or doubt that licensee had no independence of action, but that decisions made by licensee operating company and the Byllesby Service Co. were made by the same group of men, acting in dual, triple, and quadruple capacities, responsive primarily to the holding and controlling interests. This corporate "family" control was so complete in fact and limited in personnel as to require but 1 room, 1 table, 1 small group of men at 1 point of time to dictate on behalf of the pater familias as an offer by 1 member and an acceptance by another. The service contract in question is monopolistic, requiring the exclusive employment by the operating company of the Byllesby Service Co. for a term of 10 years, and provided for a profit to be paid by licensee, a public utility, for the benefit of a private holding company, into whose treasury every dollar of the profits extorted from the operating company is siphoned through the holding company's wholly-owned service company. So complete was the reliance on this control, the contract for the construction service, running into several millions of dollars, was not entered into until April 15, 1926, prior to which time a large amount of the work for which this fee is claimed had already been done. Contrary to business custom, the officers and directors of the licensee, acting in their capacity for that company, found it unnecessary to have the contract in advance of beginning work to guard against misunderstanding or unreasonable and arbitrary charges, since they were dealing with themselves, under the guise of another corporation. To ask the Commission to find that in the making of this fee contract there was any arm's-length bargaining, or real independence of action on the part of the licensee, assaults the credulity of the Commission beyond reason. Experience has abundantly proved that a man cannot serve two masters equally well in a trade nor will he often turn his back on his paymaster.

(2) In making a determination of the actual legitimate original cost of the project constructed under this contract, the Commission is not blinded by legal technicalities nor misled by attenuated theories. Where there is admitted control of both the licensee and the service company and where, as here, the two companies are virtually departments of an integrated system, the Commission must, under the provisions of the Federal Water Power Act, disregard the contract and hold that cost to the licensee can be no more, though it may under certain circumstances be less, than the cost of such service to the service company. Since the relationship of these two companies so unmistakably points to the existence of a super-imposed power arbitrarily to dictate contracts and fix charges for services, the Commission cannot be bound by the terms of such contract, but must demand evidence of the cost to the Byllesby Service Co. of the services rendered. Smith v. Illinois Bell Tel. Co., 282 U. S. 133 (1930); Western Distributing Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas, 285 U.S. 119 (1932); Wichita Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas, 2 F. Supp. 792 (1932).

In Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., supra, a similar situation was presented to the court. There the utility sued to enjoin as confiscatory an order of the Illinois commission to lower telephone rates in the city of Chicago. The Illinois company purchased, in large part, its supplies from the Western Electric Co., a manufacturing subsidiary of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and also paid to the latter company a fee of 4½ percent of its gross revenue for rental of instruments and for engineering, financial, and other services. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. owned both the contracting companies; and the Commerce Commission contended that the charges paid were excessive and should not be allowed as an expense in computing rates, without a further showing of actual cost. The Supreme

[1] The Holding Company, Bonbright and Means, 1932, pp. 114–115.

"This great system (H. M. Byllesby Co.) involves the most complicated holding-company set-up with which the writers are familiar. The underlying holding company is the Standard Gas & Electric Co., a pure holding company whose subsidiaries supply electric, gas, steam heating, telephone, water, or transportation service in 1,648 communities located in 20 States. At the end of 1930 it served 1,617,414 customers. * * * The growth of the system in recent years has been most rapid. In 1924 the total electric power generated by the system amounted to 1,414,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or 2.6 percent of the commercial total for the country. By 1930 this had increased to 4,594,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or 5.2 percent of the national total. In itself, this company represents the more or less 'normal' holding-company pyramid, the Standard Gas & Electric Co., with assets of $319,000,000 in 1930, controlling subsidiaries with assets of $1,200,000,000. But on top of this typical holding company is a corporate organization which defies simple analysis. * * *"

Court sustained this contention of the Commission. Because of the relationship between the corporations the Court ruled that:

"The point of the appellants' contention is that the Western Electric Co., through the organization and control of the American Co., occupied a special position with particular advantages in relation to the manufacture and sale of equipment to the licensees of the Bell system, including the Illinois company, that is, that it was virtually the manufacturing department for that system, and the question is as to the net earnings of the Western Electric Co. realized in that department and the extent to which, if at all, such profits figure in the estimates upon which the charge of confiscation is predicated. We think that there should be findings upon this point."

And concerning the gross fee paid the American Co., the Court said:

"There should be specific findings by the statutory court with regard to the cost of these services to the American Co. (italics ours) and the reasonable amount which should be allocated in this respect to the operating expenses of the intrastate business of the Illinois Co. in the years covered by the decree."

In the instant case, the Byllesby Service Co., through the control of it and the licensee by the Standard company, "occupied a special position with particular advantages" in rendering services to licensee as it was not only virtually the service department of the system, but was assured all of the construction and service business of licensee.

The issue was again raised in Western Distributing Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas, supra. In that case the utility sued to enjoin the enforcement of natural-gas rates by the commission for Eldorado, Kans., as being inadequate. Involved in the computation of the rate was a contract whereby the Western Distributing Co. purchased its gas for 40 cents per 1,000 cubic feet at the city gate from the Cities Service Gas Co. In affirming the denial of the injunction the Supreme Court in an opinion by Mr. Justice Roberts, pointed out that to establish a proper rate—

"necessarily required a determination of the question whether the price paid for the gas distributed is fair and reasonable. To this end the commission insists upon its authority to make such investigation as will satisfy it upon this point.

"Having in mind the affiliation of buyer and seller and the unity of control thus engendered, we think the position of the appellees is sound, and that the court below was right in holding that if appellants desired an increase of rates it was bound to offer satisfactory evidence with respect to all the costs which entered into the ascertainment of a reasonable rate. * * * There is an absence of arm's-length bargaining between the two corporate entities involved, and of all the elements which ordinarily go to fix market value. The opportunity exists for one member of the combination to charge the other an unreasonable rate for the gas furnished and thus to make such unfair charge in part the basis of the retail rate * * *.

"Where, * * * they constitute but a single interest and involve the embarkation of the total capital in what is in effect one enterprise, the elements of double profit and of the reasonableness of intercompany charges must necessarily be the subject of inquiry and scrutiny before the question as to the lawfulness of the retail rate based thereon can be satisfactorily answered. (Italics ours.)

"It is enough to say that, in view of the relations of the parties and the power implicit therein arbitrarily to fix and maintain costs as respects the distributing company which do not represent the true value of the services rendered, the State authority is entitled to a fair showing of the reasonableness of such costs, although this may involve a presentation of evidence which would not be required in the case of parties dealing at arm's length and in the general and open market, subject to the usual safeguards of bargaining and competition."

In Kansas there was an immediate sequel to the Western Distributing case in Wichita Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas, supra, to which the Western Distributing Co. and several other Cities Service companies were parties. The Kansas commission had disallowed entirely a fee of 1¾ percent to H. L. Doherty & Co. on the ground that the fee contract provided for services which, if performed, would be a duplication of services rendered by the Gas Service Co. (an intermediary Doherty holding and service company) under a contract approved by the commission, and for the reason that the company had failed to carry the burden of showing that such charges were fair and reasonable.

The court sustained the commission and said:

"We are of the opinion that the burden of proof, both under the Kansas statute and under general principles, was upon the distributing companies."

The Kansas statute referred to (secs. 74–602c, 1931 sup. R.S. Kans. 1923) is as follows:

"Showing required for fixing or charging rates: In ascertaining the reasonableness of a rate or charge to be made by a public utility, no charge for services rendered by a holding or affiliated company, or charge for material or commodity furnished or purchased from a holding or affiliated company, shall be given consideration in determining a reasonable rate or charge unless there be a showing made by the utility affected by the rate or charge as to the actual cost to the holding or affiliated company furnishing such service and material or commodity. (Italics ours.) Such showing shall consist of an itemized statement furnished by the utility setting out in detail the various items, cost for services rendered, and material or commodity furnished by the holding or affiliated company."

Section 4 (a) of the Federal Water Power Act provides that "in order to aid the Commission in determining the net investment of a licensee in any project, the licensee shall, upon oath, * * * file with the Commission, in such detail as the Commission may require, a statement in duplicate showing the actual, legitimate cost of construction of such project, * * *." And section 3 defines "actual legitimate original" cost as a component part of net investment.

(3) The principle and doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the Illinois Bell and the Western Distributing cases, supra, apply to the instant case with even greater force for the reason that the Federal Water Power Act forbids the Commission to allow other than the actual legitimate original cost of the construction of the project, whereas such statutory provision was involved in the cited cases.

The Commission interprets this triple statutory limitation to mean that the cost must be (1) actual; that is, real and bona fide, as distinguished from fictitious or fabricated, whether by intercorporate dealings or otherwise; and (2) legitimate, meaning not coerced, collusive, fraudulent, or unreasonable; and (3) original, as excluding elements of subsequent enhancement, profit, or accretion. Pursuant to this and other provisions of the statute, the Commission must "pierce the veil" and find the cost to the Byllesby Service Co. in determining the cost to the licensee.

(4) No evidence was introduced as to the cost to Byllseby Service Co. of construction work, but as to the question of the reasonableness of the 7½ percent charged the licensee by the service company under the contract, the licensee introduced evidence purporting to prove that the 7½ percent on the cost of the project represented no more, and possibly less, than the market value of such services. Where there is common control it is not sufficient merely to show that the prices are no higher or are even less than obtainable elsewhere, for such evidence was offered in Western Distributing Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas (285 U.S. 119) and held insufficient to prove the reasonableness of a charge. The reasons against accepting the rule of "market value" are even stronger in the instant case where the pertinent issue is: "What is the cost within the meaning of the statute of the services rendered to the licensee?" In Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., supra, the court, because of the interrelationship, demanded to know the cost to the holding company of the services rendered as a factor in the determination of the reasonableness of the fee paid. And in the Western Distributing Co. case the court clearly placed the burden of proof as to this cost upon the utility. This would seem definitely to exclude market value as a measure for the service rendered, for manifestly market value is not cost.

Furthermore, there can be no such thing as "market value" under the circumstances in the instant case. Here the Byllesby Service Co. has the exclusive and monopolistic control of the construction and service work of the companies of the system. It can calculate on its volume of business, can rationalize its activities, can economize in volume purchasing, and otherwise effect economies which might not be available to an independent contractor bidding in a free market. In the very nature of things the Byllesby Service Co. was doing business in a closed market. Having destroyed the open market, insofar as the services here involved are concerned, it cannot be heard to appeal to the standard of an open market by which to measure its charge for services to its affiliate. For Byllesby Service Co. to have denied licensee the right to an open market on bids was an arbitrary act and invites no intervention to correct its own wrong.

(5) Counsel for the licensee contend, however, that inasmuch as the Standard Co. owned only a majority of the stock of the said Louisville Gas & Electric Co. (which owned all of the stock of the licensee), it is not within the reason or the rule of Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., supra. It is argued that to limit the charges of the service company to cost for services rendered the licensee would be to give the minority interest an undue advantage through the benefits of the services at cost. When the majority interest imposes a monopolistic service contract on licensee through system control, it has no right to complain that the minority shares in the alleged economies which result from such involuntary servitude of the minority interests. Indeed, it is not unreasonable to assume that the minority stockholders were content to submit to the Standard Co. control, in the hope and expectation that the said Louisville Gas & Electric Co. would benefit by being a part of the "system." Furthermore, the control exercised through the majority over this company enabled the Byllesby Service Co. to command an assumed market for its services with the licensee company. This reduced the proportionate amount of overhead to be allocated to each company of the whole system just as much as though the said Louisville Gas & Electric Co. were a wholly owned subsidiary of the system; and since that company contributed equally to the system scheme through the licensee it should benefit equally with the wholly owned companies.

The contract that was imposed upon the licensee was similar in form to those used by the Byllesby Service Co. for its other affiliated "clients" from the time of its inception. Prior to 1919 the engineering and management services now performed by the Byllesby Service Co. were performed for the Standard system by H. M. Byllesby Co., which caps the Standard pyramid. The H. M. Byllesby Co. also rendered financial services, marketed securities, and participated in syndicates on behalf of the companies controlled. In 1918 H. M. Byllesby Co. decided to confine its business to investment banking. At that time it had heavy holdings in the Standard Co. and turned over to it the profitable managerial, engineering, and construction business along with the organization to carry it on.

The transfer or gift was made as of January 1, 1919, although the formal offer and acceptance were not effected until March 5, 1919. In June 1919 the Standard Co. caused to be incorporated the present Byllesby Service Co. It turned over the business it had received from H. M. Byllesby Co. at a price set at $1,000,000 payable in the form of 100,000 shares of the new corporation's capital stock. In its balance sheets the new corporation credited its capital stock at $1,000,000 and set up as a balancing asset "property contracts" for $1,000,000. Although "property contracts" were thus set up, an audit made by the Federal Trade Commission, hereinafter referred to, shows no formal contracts executed before September 1, 1921, more than 2 years thereafter.

The H. M. Byllesby Co. had been charging a management fee of 1¾ percent and an engineering fee of 7½ percent, and this practice was continued by the management-engineering corporation organization after it was transferred to the Standard Co. and then to the Byllesby Service Co. In 1921 the Standard Co., in a collateral trust agreement securing an issue of bonds, pledged all of the 100,000 shares of the Byllesby Service Co. and that company's engineering and management contracts with 12 subsidiaries of the Standard Co. The only subsidiary not included in the collateral list was said Louisville Gas & Electric Co. These contracts were all dated September 1, 1921, and cover a period of 21 years, expiring August 31, 1942. A special form of contract was entered into with the licensee (exhibit D, preliminary accounting report), the general features being the same, however, as in the form contract for the other subsidiaries.

The fees collected under these contracts proved highly profitable to the Byllesby Service Co. The Federal Trade Commission audit shows that for the years 1922–27 the total gross income for the company for all services aggregated $22,244,044.45, while the operating expenses were $11,449,091.28, leaving a net income of $10,794,953.17, or a profit of 98.5 percent on the cost of rendering the services. For the engineering department in the same years the total gross income was $6,820,142.98, while the total operating expenses aggregated $4,439,396.62, leaving a net income of $2,380,-764.35, a profit of 53.62 percent on the cost of this service.

Such profits resulting from holding-company control and intercorporate contracts are not only unreasonable but shocking, when considered in the light of their direct influence upon a business affected with a public interest. The public utility does not stand in a competitive field in which a customer may exercise a free opportunity in an open market to buy where he can buy at the lowest price; it is a business monopolistic in character, where there are many customers but only one vendor, a vendor who is not subject to the restraint of competition in the sale of that which is a necessity, and who, unless restrained by the regulative power of government, may charge its helpless customers what the traffic will bear. Insofar as the holding company may be able to accentuate this natural disadvantage in which the consumer finds himself in dealing with the operating utility, the policies of such holding company are not equitably free from public scrutiny, judgment, and criticism. Abuse by a private unregulated corporation of the exercise of the power of control to collect excessive toll from an operating public utility is a gross injustice to the public which pays the bill. Such intercorporate profits have no proper place in the cost or capital investment structure of a public utility operating company. This is doubly true where the operating company is a company bound by Federal statute to a capital structure limited to net investment.

The Byllesby Service Co. furnished for these extraordinary profits only services provided by the personnel of the management group. There was no substantial investment upon which to earn a return. It took no risk. It constructed on a cost-plus basis. It purchased materials and supplies for licensee's account. The finances of licensee being under system control, there were no losses incident to bad debts, delay in collecting, disputes, or law suits.

(6) Upon its incorporation, the Service Co.'s sole asset, capitalized as a round million dollars, was the artificial value implicit in its connections and ability, through a small group of men, in their fiduciary capacity as directors of operating companies, to guarantee profitable business. Officers and directors of a quasi-public corporation, in contracting with themselves in another corporate capacity for services where the gain of one may be the loss of another, must be actively cognizant of their duty in fact as well as in law to act as a trustee charged with administering the trust equitably in the interest of the consuming public. This dealing with themselves by directors and executives on behalf of their cooperating companies can only be justified, if at all, on the ground that in their capacity as managers of the Service Co. they can and do achieve greater economy and service for the operating company than if they restricted themselves to their capacity as managers of only the operating company. Hence, they owe an active, positive duty as officers of the operating company to perform or purchase the greatest service at the greatest economy. And it follows that the savings achieved by such actions should redound to the operating companies on whose behalf they have been employed.

This is not a new doctrine. The law is well settled that officers and directors must not overlook the fiduciary duties they owe to their corporations when dealing with themselves in another corporate capacity. (Geddes v. Anaconda Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590 (1921); Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U.S. 587 (1875); Wardell v. Railroad Co., 103 U.S. 651 (1880)). Passive acquiescence by independent stockholders in the contracts of the management made with its own corporation does not excuse those in control from their duty to protect the public interest. For officers and directors of utilities, such as the licensee, hold positions of trust as quasi-public officers not only to the stockholders but to the public they serve. (Moody v. Kell, 235 Fed. 86 (1916); Cook v. Sherman, 20 Fed. 167 (1882)). Furthermore, they are forbidden to negotiate construction contracts with their corporations which are adverse to the public interest as well as to that of the stockholders of the corporation. As early as 1888, in Woodstock Iron Co. v. R. and D. Extension Co. (129 U.S. 643), the Supreme Court said:

"Corporations, it is true, formed for their (railroad) construction are private corporations; but whilst their directors are required to look to the interests of their stockholders, they must do so in subordination to and in connection with the public interest, which they are equally bound to respect and subserve. All arrangements, therefore, by which directors or stockholders or other persons may acquire gain, by inducing those corporations to disregard their duties to the public, are illegal and lead to unfair dealing. * * *"

(7) In reply to the demand of the Commission for evidence as to the costs, the licensee contends that it is not possible to furnish evidence upon which to determine the actual costs to the Byllesby Service Co. for the specific services rendered to the licensee, except as those costs are reflected in the over-all operating costs and operating revenues as shown by its books for its engineering department, which rendered the bulk of the services under the fee contract. That the licensee may, through failure to obey the law, find it impossible to furnish such evidence of cost is not a satisfactory answer to the mandatory requirement of the statute, of which not only the licensee but the Byllesby Service Co. and all parties interested, through affiliation or otherwise, are charged with notice. This project was licensed under the provisions of the Federal Water Power Act and by the specific terms of the license all the provisions of the act are incorporated therein. Among these provisions is the requirement that the licensee shall keep accounts in conformity to the Commission's "system of accounts prescribed for licensees under the Federal Water Power Act", issued November 20, 1922, 3 years prior to issuance of license. If licensee and its affiliated service company had conformed to the plain requirements of the statute, the license, and the Commission's accounting rules, it would have been a simple and easy procedure to submit to the Commission satisfactory evidence as to these costs. This is a proper burden cast upon the licensee by the statute (Cf. Western Distributing Co. v. Public Service Commission of Kansas, supra).

(8) As a substitute for evidence of actual cost, the licensee proposed, through its counsel, in a stipulation entered into with Solicitor for the Commission, subject to the approval of the Commission, that for the engineering department of the Byllesby Service Co. the Commission should find the average ratio of total expense to total gross income was 65.09 percent, and that this operating ratio indicates the relation of cost to income for the department; and it was further proposed to apply this ratio to the fee paid by the licensee to determine the cost of the services rendered. The ratio was obtained by an analysis of the accounts of the Byllesby Service Co. for the years 1922–27, as shown in an audit and report of the Federal Trade Commission, made pursuant to Senate Resolution 83, Seventieth Congress, first session, directing investigation of certain utility corporations.

The Commission is of the opinion that it cannot accept this substituted or secondary evidence, involving a substantial amount of money, and, what is more important, an avoidance of the statutory requirements of more exact and direct proof. No question is entertained as to the accuracy of the Federal Trade Commission's audit; but that Commission derives its authority from, and its duties are defined by, a statute different in terms, intent, and purpose from the Federal Water Power Act. Its audit, made for a different purpose, does not show certain important facts required by the Federal Water Power Act. It is the duty of the Federal Power Commission not only to audit and determine items of alleged cost with reference to their actual expenditure, but also to scrutinize each item with regard to its being a reasonable, appropriate, and legitimate cost. The accounts of the Byllesby Service Co. as kept at the time of the said audit show arbitrary classifications of expenditures not in conformity to the Commission's rules of accounting. The same is true as to allocations of percentages and ratios of overhead and expense, and also of profit to the engineering and other departments. Hence there is no evidence before the Commission nor in the proposed stipulation from which it can determine with reasonable certainty the cost of the services within the meaning and intent of the act.

(9) In a case involving an intercorporate contract such as is here presented the Commission should have submitted to it satisfactory evidence as to all elements of cost, including salaries paid, and bonuses, if any, to the officers and directors of the service company, and also to show whether there had been any duplication of such payments to individual officials for services allegedly performed in their dual capacities.

For the purpose of the Federal Trade Commission such information was unnecessary and was not collated. The proposed ratio is admittedly not exact as applied to the specific services rendered to licensee's project but is at best an over-all average cost of services rendered by one department of the service company. To accept this proposed ratio would be to assume, as the Commission has no right to do, that all of the items entering into the over-all costs are of such character and amount as to be in conformity to the requirements of the act and the Commission's accounting rules and regulations.

The Commission is of the opinion that it has no right to predicate a finding and determination upon the tendered secondary evidence and is unwilling to approve and adopt the proposed stipulation. Therefore it disallows the fee of $481,533.48 as part of the actual legitimate original cost of this project, with leave to licensee to submit appropriate evidence in support of its claim.

It is clear that the failure of licensee to submit evidence of these costs was due to the fact that it had no record of such costs, nor any control over the only source of this essential information. System management had supplanted company autonomy, thereby depriving licensee of any real freedom to manage and direct its own affairs. For necessary legal purposes its corporate body was kept alive, while skillful pressure produced a general paralysis. A corporate entity became a subservient and highly profitable nonentity.

The undisputed evidence shows that the Byllesby Service Co.—not a public utility, not subject to direct regulation by either Federal or State authority—took charge of the affairs of licensee, a public utility. It prepared the application of the articles of incorporation; as licensee's "agent" it prepared, filed, and followed through to its granting, the application to the Commission for the license for the project. The financing, purchasing, construction, inspection, most of the accounting, and all of the legal work were done for licensee. These were not acts of benevolence, but intruded services for gain.

Such a holding company dynasty—not exceptional, but typical—with its absentee ownership and management, its sovereignty over far-flung dominions in many States, but subject to the direct jurisdiction of none, its authority centralized in a few strong hands, its "fee" taxation without representation of the operating companies, is a grave economic and social peril. It calls for prompt corrective and preventive measures. The crux of the problem is the present inadequacy of the law. State commissions and the Federal Power Commission should be clothed with all regulatory jurisdiction possible over such holding and service companies.

Defenders of system control and service contend, as counsel for licensee argued in this case, that through a large coordinated system economies are effected: (1) Through a better specialized managerial and technical staff than any one operating company could support, and (2) decreased overhead by elimination of "lapse time", etc., because of assured "clients", and that the work to be done for the whole system can be rationalized. Waiving the unsocial aspects, and certain limitations to the economic argument, it is to be observed that the cooperative support of the operating companies in an integrated service plan is the sine qua non of the economies resulting. The holding company merely brings the companies together and acts as a clearing house; of itself it contributes nothing to economy. Hence, it has no right to take unto itself all of the fruits of the cooperation. Such a family purse arrangement is unjust and suggests a legal or, at least, a de facto separation, so the holding company and the operating company may live apart, each manage its own affairs, and support itself.

The valid objection to the holding company practice of profit making through monopolistic control of its subsidiaries has been recognized by one large holding company which recently abandoned this practice. The substituted arrangement provided may not be an adequate treatment of the subject, but it at least marks definite recognition of the problem and an approach toward its solution.[2]

LOSS ON GOVERNMENT DAM

(10) Licensee claims as a part of the cost of the project the sum of $193,164.34, representing an alleged loss in the construction of a dam under contract with the Federal Government. This dam, known as "United States Dam No. 41", was constructed primarily for the purpose of improving navigation on the Ohio River, but its use for hydroelectric purposes was leased by the Government to the licensee.

Pertinent facts upon which this claim is based, and as to which there is no controversy, are: Licensee, by resolution September 30, 1925, requested the Byllesby Service Co. to bid for the construction of this dam, offering to guarantee the Byllesby Service Co. its actual costs plus a percentage fee. The Byllesby Service Co. submitted a flat bid and was awarded the contract by the Government. By the terms of the contract between licensee company and the Byllesby Service Co., executed April 15, 1926, the licensee guaranteed the payment of all the Byllesby Service Co. costs in the construction of the dam plus an engineering and supervision fee of 5 percent thereon, the licensee to receive any amount in excess of that total which might be paid to the Byllesby Service Co. by the Government under the contract.

The Byllesby Service Co. completed the dam, including a cofferdam begun by the Government, but let to the Byllesby Service Co. for completion without competitive bids, more than a year ahead of the time set by the contract. The Government paid the contractor the full amount of its bid and contract in the sum of $2,362,499.93. The Byllesby Service Co.'s alleged costs expended, plus the 5-percent fee, totaled $2,555,664.27, or $193,164.34 in excess of the amount received from the Government. This excess amount was paid by licensee to the Byllesby Service Co. under the contract. Of this amount so paid, $71,466.04 represented the alleged excess costs over the amount paid by the Government, and $121,698.30 represented the 5-percent fee.

In support of its claim the licensee contends that delay in completion of the dam would have delayed operation of the plant, resulting in loss of revenue and increased cost of the project through additional interest charges during an extended construction period; that such delay would possibly have also meant additional costs in cleaning up after winter floods and ice damage; that other possible consequences of delay or suspension of work during the winter might have increased overhead expense and impaired morale of the construction force; that an added measure of assurance against such contingent additional costs of the project was afforded licensee by reason of the Byllesby Service Co. getting the contract for the dam, since it already had the contract for the project works and was in better position than any other contractor to coordinate and expedite the construction of both the dam and project works. For these and other reasons, licensee contends that economies were effected for its benefit greatly in excess of the amount paid to the Byllesby Service Co. under the contract.

Whatever factual basis, if any, there may be for the equitable considerations urged by the licensee, the Commission is prohibited by law from allowing this "loss" item unless it is a part of the cost of the licensed project works. The terms "project" and "project works" are defined by section 3 of the act, and specific instructions are given in sections 9 and 10 as to their description, in detail, in both the application for the license and in the license itself. The clear and necessary purpose of such provisions of the statute can only be to define the subject matter to which the Commission's jurisdiction and the licensee's responsibilities attach. Reference to the application and license show no mention of the dam as a part of the "project works" to be constructed by the licensee. On the contrary, they show that the dam was to be constructed by the Government and its use for hydroelectric purposes leased to the licensee, subject to the requirements for navigation. Therefore, licensee had no authorization to construct the dam nor any responsibility in respect to it.

At the time the license for this project was negotiated, it may have been feasible, as is often done, had licensee so desired, to have included the dam in the project, in which case licensee would have had the direct authority and responsibility for constructing the dam, and its cost would have been a proper charge to the fixed capital of the project. But this was not done, the licensee electing to confine its construction activities to the hydroelectric project proper. Therefore, any responsibility it subsequently assumed with reference to work extraneous to the project, with the hope that it might benefit the project, was assumed at its own risk in its capacity other than as licensee, and any resultant loss is not, under the law, a part of the cost of the project.

To adopt any other rule than that of restricting the commission's jurisdiction and limiting the licensee's liabilities to the project, would open the door to a confusing maze of activities and consequences.

But if, arguendo, it is assumed that the alleged loss on the dam has legal and proper relation to the cost of the project works, the facts and arguments offered by licensee in support of the claim are neither convincing nor persuasive.

Licensee's brief lays emphasis upon the contention that the Byllesby Service Co. became a bidder for the dam contract at the urgent request and solely for the intended benefit of the licensee, and hence should be protected against loss. It is argued that the Byllesby Service Co. "was very loath to undertake the building of this dam and as a condition to its so doing it insisted upon and received from licensee a guaranty" and again, that "the licensee prevailed upon the Byllesby Service Co. to undertake the construction of this dam." Remembering the common control of the two companies, the identity of their officers as shown in the chart, supra, and that it is admitted that both were dominated by common directors, the argument that one was "loath to undertake" and that the other "prevailed" is specious, for it assumes an independence of action which admitted facts refute. Prevailing is done from the top downward, not from the bottom up.

If licensee had the legal right, even assuming it had the power, to induce the Byllesby Service Co. to build the dam and guarantee it against loss, then, however long the delay or great the damage from floods, ice, or vicissitudes beyond control, the licensee would have to stand the loss, even though it may have been a million dollars instead of the sum claimed. If licensee may under the act undertake work or risk outside the limits of the project itself, it may do so anywhere along the line from the point of construction to the place of consumption of its power. For instance, if licensee had had a profitable contract to furnish power to a railway company as soon as the job of electrifying the railroad

[2] The Holding Company, Bonbright and Means, 1932, p. 186.

"The Commonwealth & Southern Corporation * * * has recently announced that it has completely abandoned the principle of the profit-making management service contracts. It has achieved this object by the formation of an ancillary service company called 'the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation of New York.' The nature of this company is described in the following excerpt from Moody's Public Utilities, 1930 (p. 1557):

"'All stock of the management company is divided among the operating companies in the system pro rata to their gross earnings. Company renders a group purchasing and general supervisory service at cost divided pro rata on the basis of the gross earnings of the operating companies, but in case the cost of the service supplied is less than that estimated, the difference will be distributed to the operating companies in the form of dividends.'

"* * * It, or something like it, must sooner or later be adopted by all utility systems if they are to survive the growing resentment which their recent financial practices have aroused in the minds of the thinking public."

was completed, and if it feared that the contractor the railway company might employ would not complete the electrification of the railroad by the time the project was ready to furnish power, then, under the rule invoked by licensee, it would be equally justified in inducing the Byllesby Service Co., by an underwriting, to bid low enough to get the electrification contract. Such an elastic rule might be further stretched to include the building, as well as electrification, of the railroad.

One of the dangers and uncertainties of this rule is its dependance upon the fears of licensee as to what might possibly happen under an independent contractor, however competent, and leaves no practical basis for licensee's judgment or Commission determination.

Licensee's contention that it was highly important to it that the Byllesby Service Co., already having the contract for the project, should also construct the dam, is based upon a recognized principle of economy through coordination of construction work. But the argument here rests upon an assumption, unsupported by any evidence whatever, that any other contractor which might have been employed by the Government would not have cooperated in coordinating the work on the dam with that on the project. Nor is there factual basis for the further argument that no other contractor than Byllesby Service Co. would have brought the dam work up to a safe stage before the winter season, thus affording protection of the project works from possible floods and ice jams.

The evidence shows that both contracts were let at approximately the same time, that the project and the dam were side by side and physically related, that both jobs required, in large part, the same kind of construction equipment, materials, and labor, and that delay on either job would have been reflected in increased costs of both. No sound reason is apparent for finding that the Byllesby Service Co. had greater economic urge than another to coordinate, plan, and work against losses contingent upon avoidable delay or upon failure to cooperate. In fact, it would appear that any other responsible contractor would have had a most impelling added incentive to avoid such delays and losses, since it would not have had a licensee contract to insure against such losses, and to guarantee a profit, as the Byllesby Service Co. had.

In further support of this claim the licensee contends that Byllesby Service Co. saved it a substantial amount in its interest account during construction and enabled it to earn revenue earlier, through the completion of the dam ahead of the contract period. This may be granted, but there is no evidence, except the licensee's apprehensions, that another contractor would not have finished the dam as promptly as the Byllesby Service Co. It is a matter of common knowledge that investment in working capital for equipment, materials, labor, overhead, etc., a necessary element of cost in construction work, is reduced, and the profit thereby increased, by pushing the work to an orderly and prompt completion. It cannot be assumed that another contractor would have been either ignorant or unmindful of this A B C of construction economics.

(11) If for no other reason, the Commission should disallow the item in question because it is based on considerations altogether too conjectural and speculative to afford a basis for regulatory action. The arguments that another contractor would not have completed the dam as expeditiously, would not have coordinated the work on the dam with that on the project, that the approaching winter season might bring floods and ice jams which the then stage of project construction might not withstand—all these are but recitals of licensee's imagined difficulties and losses, crossing phantom bridges it never got to. To allow this claim it would be necessary to appraise the value of things which might conceivably have happened under circumstances which could have existed, but did not. The courts have been unwilling to be guided by considerations less speculative than those advanced in this case. (Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co., 212 U.S. 1; Tagg Bros. & Morehead v. U.S., 29 F. (2d) (750), affirmed 280 U.S. 420; Los Angeles v. Railroad Commission, U.S. (May 8, 1933).)

For the reasons assigned, the item here in question is disallowed.

COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATION

(12) The amounts properly allowable as project costs for interest and taxes during construction, and for power generated during construction, as a credit against project cost depend in part upon the date when the project can be regarded as available for operation. This the Solicitor contends should be January 1, 1928; the licensee May 1, 1928. We adopt the former date as proper under all the circumstances.

For this purpose we regard that date as proper when in the course of due diligence the project has been sufficiently completed to be reasonably reliable and available for service. Not merely its technical physical functioning, but the nature of the use for which it is designed and its adequacy to meet the burdens such use entails are factors to be considered.

This project was designed and built to furnish secondary power only. Due to the caprices of the Ohio river, the plant is totally disabled for considerable portions of each year either from high or low water. For primary power during such periods, and in emergency at all times, the Louisville Gas & Electric Co. of Kentucky, an affiliate through whose system the project output is distributed, maintains a steam generating plant at Waterside, a short distance up the river, adequate in capacity and attendance to take over at short notice the entire load of the project. The means provided and preparations made for this purpose were developed in detail in evidence, with voluminous exhibits recording the situation daily at both plants throughout the period in question, and for comparative periods before and after. Upon its full consideration we are convinced that by January 1, 1928, the project had been demonstrated capable of discharging its intended function as a producer of secondary power.

While there were some suspensions thereafter of the entire plant for lack of water, and of particular machines for certain supplemental construction processes, such as pointing, installing safety devices, and certain mechanisms for greater convenience in operation, the loss of generation from the latter causes was minor; and in each case the necessary load was promptly absorbed by the Waterside plant, in accordance with the operating relationship intended between the two plants.

INTEREST DURING CONSTRUCTION

(13) The allowance of interest during construction is authorized by section 3 of the Federal Water Power Act, which incorporates "insofar as practicable" the "Classification of Investment in Road and Equipment of Steam Roads, issue of 1914, Interstate Commerce Commission." The Federal Power Commission's system of accounts prescribed for licensees provides, under Account 394, for the inclusion in the capital accounts of reasonable charges for interest during the construction period on the licensee's own funds. This accounting regulation corresponds to the Interstate Commerce Commission's Account 76, "Interest During Construction."

What properly constitutes the construction period is to be determined upon the facts and circumstances in each case. The licensee claims January 1, 1924, as the beginning of the construction period and the evidence shows, the Commission finds, that construction began on that date and continued with due diligence thereafter. The Commission having found January 1, 1928, to be the date on which the project was available for service, it follows that interest is allowable from January 1, 1924, through December 31, 1927.

The interest claimed by the licensee is $525,744.44. Interest was computed at the rate of one half of 1 percent per month on construction balances totaling $8,309,522. The Commission finds that, under all the circumstances, the rate of interest of 6 percent per annum claimed by the licensee is not unreasonable and is therefore allowed. The project construction was financed by advances from the Louisville Gas & Electric Co. on an open-account basis and interest computations were made upon such advances, but the licensee having been engaged in construction activities other than those pertaining to the project, it becomes necessary to separate the project from the nonproject expenditures. Thus by the elimination of the principal amounts of nonproject charges upon which interest claimed was computed, the interest properly allowable under the act may be determined.

The first nonproject cost item deductible is the charge covering work orders C-9, C-16, and C-13, amounting to $563,439.47; the next nonproject charge eliminated is under EC 806 of $174,965.50; a further item represents several nonproject charges in the form of payments to the Byllesby Service Co., including the disallowed fee, supra, in the total amount of $514,260.91; and items representing miscellaneous nonproject charges which have been disallowed by the Commission aggregating $29,415.23. The interest on the total of these items, $1,282,081.11, must be deducted from the interest claimed by the licensee.

By a stipulation between counsel for the licensee and the Solicitor, and approved by the Commission, the method of computing interest during construction is that used by the examiner in the preliminary accounting report.

Having determined the amount of nonproject construction included in the advances for all construction undertakings, it becomes necessary to determine the portion of interest applicable to the nonproject charges. This is accomplished by dividing the open-account balance as of December 31, 1927, $8,309,522, into the interest, $525,744.47, charged on it during the 4-year period, which produces a ratio of 0.063270117. By applying this factor to nonproject construction, $1,282,081.11, the result, $81,117.42, is the amount of nonproject interest to be deducted from the total interest claimed by the licensee, leaving the sum of $444,627.05. Therefore, the Commission finds that $444,627.05 is the proper allowance for interest on the licensee's own funds during the construction period. It should be noted that the annual rate at which interest is computed is 6 percent on all amounts charged, computed from the month in which incurred. The other rate referred to (0.063270117) is merely the arithmetically resulting ratio of interest to construction charges covering the whole 4-year period.

ATTORNEYS' FEES AND EXPENSES

(14) The licensee claimed as a part of the cost of the project the sum of $2,900 paid as retainer fees to a firm of lawyers in 38 separate vouchers from 1923 to 1928. For lack of satisfactory evidence as to the character of service rendered and the nature of the contract of employment, the examiner wrote to licensee July 12, 1928, for further information in regard to these fees. No reply was received by February 21, 1931, the date on which the examiner filed his report, and this item was therefore suspended. In the protest filed by licensee, this item, with many others, was reasserted as valid. At a conference between representatives of the Commission and of the licensee in regard to numerous items in controversy, resulting in the stipulation hereinbefore referred to, the allowance of this $2,900 was agreed to and identified as item 34 (B-1) in said stipulation.

At the hearing the Commission, inquiring as to the new or additional evidence presented at the conference which led to agreement on particular items, asked attorneys for licensee for information as to the terms of the Byllesby Service Co. contract with the law firm to which this sum had been paid. Representatives of the licensee being unable to inform the Commission as to this, counsel agreed later to get the desired information and report the facts to the Commission. Thereafter, counsel for licensee advised the Commission by letter that the law firm was a department of the Byllesby Service Co., and formally withdrew the claim; for service by the legal department at the "home office" is included in the 7½-percent fee contract, discussed supra.

The Commission is unable to escape the conviction that the withholding of the facts about this claim was not through mere inadvertence. It was brought directly to licensee's attention by the examiner's letter which was unanswered; and again when examiner's report suspended this item, a copy being serviced on licensee; and again when licensee filed its protest, reasserting the validity of the claim; again when it was the subject of a conference, resulting in its approval by stipulation; and once more when the Commission inquired about it. During all of this time the Byllesby Service Co. knew, and licensee also presumably knew, that the law firm was merely a department of Byllesby Service Co., collecting from affiliates fees in which the Byllesby Service Co. directly participated. And as bearing upon the good faith in handling this matter it is significant that two members of this legal department were officers in the Standard system. The Commission can do no less than condemn the evasion and concealment in connection with this matter.

The licensee's letter admitting that the law firm was a department of the Byllesby Service Co. caused the Commission to reexamine other law fees claimed by licensee and approved by the examiner. Of such other fees we find amounts aggregating $6,000 which, so far as we can determine upon an incomplete record, are for services rendered by the legal department at the home office, and provided for in the service contract, and this further amount is disallowed. But, since licensee has not had opportunity to be heard as to this $6,000 disallowance, it is made with leave to licensee to apply for further hearing thereon.

MOTION PICTURES AND SUPPLIES

(15) The licensee claimed as a part of the cost of the project two items, one in the sum of $8,200.02 and the other $756.10, covering charges for airplane photography and making motion pictures, and including films, film cases, motion-picture machine and parts, lantern slides, photographs, reprints, frames, and other accessories. It is contended that the cost of these were a necessary complement to the construction of the project.

In the stipulation hereinbefore referred to between the solicitor and counsel for the licensee it was agreed that all of the first amount except $1,000 should be allowed and that all of the second amount except $186.43 should be allowed, leaving a total of $7,769.69 approved for allowance.

Upon the facts recited in the stipulation the Commission is unable to approve this item of the stipulation and the said amount is therefore disallowed. But inasmuch as licensee, at the hearing, relied upon the expected approval of the Commission of this stipulation and therefore introduced no evidence in further support of this item, this disallowance is made with leave to licensee to apply for further hearing thereon.

The Commission recognizes the value of modern photography as a medium for the conveyance of ideas of design and methods of their execution, and also the historical value of such a panoramic view of the various stages of the construction processes and the probable subsequent use which may be made of such photography by engineers, designers, and contractors. But the licensee was engaged in the construction of this one project and the direct benefit to such project from such photography does not satisfactorily appear from the record and hence such costs cannot be approved as a proper and necessary expense in the construction of the licensed project.

It is not doubted that this photography would be of benefit to engineers and contractors in the future in the construction of hydroelectric projects and that it may have large value to an organization like the Byllesby Service Co., which is engaged in the business of designing and constructing such plants, but the licensee should not have incurred this expense to create records for future use by others than the licensee.

PUBLICITY EXPENSE, HANDLING VISITORS, ETC.

(16) The licensee claims $3,285 as a proper project cost incurred for a banquet given to foremen and bosses in construction of the project and of United States Dam No. 41.

This item was included in the said stipulation, agreeing that this expense, if allowed, should be divided in the proportion of seven ninths to the project and two ninths to the Government dam and that "it is agreed that if the purpose of this expenditure is deemed appropriate, the amount thereof is reasonable. It is further agreed that this item may be determined by the Commission upon this stipulation and other matters of record before it without further hearing."

The Commission holds that a banquet is not an appropriate or proper part of the cost of a public-utility project, and this claim is, therefore, disallowed.

Licensee contends in support of this claim that the banquet was given in fulfillment of a promise made to encourage the speeding up of construction in order to raise the substructure above the level of winter floods so that construction could be carried on through the winter, and that this purpose was accomplished. It appears from the record that this banquet was not limited to the foremen and bosses but included city and other public officials, many members of the chamber of commerce, and other citizens, to the total number of about 500. To approve such an expenditure as a proper project cost would, in the opinion of the Commission, not only be without authority in the act but also open the door to "good will" advertising. Consumers may not properly be required to pay for hospitality they do not share.

(17) A further sum of $7,899.03 is claimed by licensee as a proper cost of the project, covering several expenditures, as follows:

The sum of $1,446 represents the cost of erecting an outdoor observation platform from which visitors might view, with safety, construction operations. The Commission allows seven ninths of this item, $1,124.63, and disallows the remaining two ninths, $321.37, as properly allocable to the United States dam project.

Another item of $2,000 representing salaries of guides for the further protection of visitors is considered proper, and seven ninths thereof, $1,555.55, is allowed, the remaining two ninths, $444.45, being allocable to said United States dam construction.

In allowing these two items the Commission recognized the legal duty of the licensee to take reasonable precautions and to provide reasonable means for the protection of the public against personal injuries. Upon all the evidence the Commission finds that the erection of the observation platform and the furnishing of guides was in the discharge of the licensee's duties to the public and that these provisions for the public safety cost substantially less and were more effective than the alternative of fencing and policing the construction area.

(18) The $4,453.03 remaining of the total item of $7,899.03 covers, insofar as the Commission is able to determine from the said stipulations and an incomplete record as to the facts, miscellaneous expenditures, some of which are disallowed because made subsequent to the date on which the Commission has found the project to be available for service, and the others because of the purposes of such expenditures. It appears that a large part of this item covered the rental of busses for transportation of visitors to and from the project, the serving of lunches, soft drinks, cigars, and other forms of entertainment in no sense appropriate to or proper for inclusion in capital structure of the project. When the licensee provided safe platforms and guides for visitors, hereinbefore approved, it discharged its full duty under the law to the public, and any added courtesies must be borne by the company in its capacity other than as licensee of this project. For the reasons assigned the said claim of $4,453.03 is disallowed.

RENTAL OF NONPROJECT LANDS

(19) The licensee claimed $24,120.69 as rental for nonproject lands owned by licensee and used in connection with construction activities. This land is not within the project boundaries as defined in the license, but it is proper to allow a fair rental for the 3 years it was used for construction activities. The amount claimed as rent is equivalent to 10 percent per year, or 30 percent on the cost of 99.96 acres. The examiner reported that only 80.67 acres of this land were actually used, and recommended the allowance of 30 percent on the cost thereof, or $18,180.26, and suspended the balance of the claim, $5,94043, as representing the 30 percent on the cost of the unused acreage. In the stipulation previously referred to it was agreed that the amount suspended by the examiner, $5,940.43, should be allowed.

The Commission is unable to approve the stipulation upon the evidence before it, nor does it approve the 30 percent as a fair rental for 3 years.

The Commission is of the opinion that while licensee is entitled to a compensatory rental on its nonproject land actually and necessarily used for construction purposes, it is not entitled to a rental above carrying charges on its own lands used to construct its own project. And as 6 percent is the interest rate claimed by licensee, and approved by the Commission, on its own funds furnished for all other purposes during construction, this rate, 6 percent, plus 2 percent to cover taxes, will, in the opinion of the Commission, fully compensate for all carrying charges on the cost of said 80.67 acres. Therefore, the Commission allows 8 percent of the cost of the 80.67 acres, as shown in the record, amounting to $14,544.21, and disallows the balance of the claim, $9,576.48.

But as licensee, relying upon the stipulation for allowance of its claim, presented no evidence at the hearing in support thereof, this disallowance is made with leave to licensee to apply for a further hearing on this item.

MISCELLANEOUS DISALLOWANCES

Under a stipulation, an item classified as local engineering and superintendence and known as "no. 13", in the total amount of $5,245.74, was disallowed.

Another item classified as accounting, auditing, and clerical expenses and known as "item no. 14" in the sum of $427.76 was disallowed under the said stipulation.

(20) The Commission has approved both of these stipulations. Included in the said two amounts as originally claimed by the licensee as proper project costs are amounts which represent expenses of engineers and other employees of the Byllesby Service Co. in attendance upon various conventions. The Commission is unable to understand why the licensee should have considered such expenditures as having any direct or proper relation to the cost of the project under consideration. The attendance of employees of the service company at such gatherings doubtless has real value to the Byllesby Service Co., their employee, but to charge such expenses to the cost of this public-utility project appears to the Commission to be without any semblance of justification.

To include such expenditures in a statement of cost filed under oath tends seriously to impair the assurance of accuracy and good faith which such a statement should import.

CURBING THE POWER TRUST

In urging governmental control to avert the "grave economic and social peril" presented by the Power Trust's dynasties of holding companies, President Roosevelt's newly reorganized Federal Power Commission points the way to a long-needed reform.

Congress and the State legislatures should enact laws, as the Commission recommends, to control these unregulated corporations, which all too often plunder investors with one hand while overcharging consumers with the other.

For the first time in the 14-year history of so-called "regulation of water power", a Commission entrusted with this regulation enunciates conserving, constructive, and promising principles.

And likewise, for the first time, there is in the revitalized agency led by Chairman Frank R. McNinch a commission competent and zealous to carry out these principles—a commission that may prove to be the "tribune of the people" that President Roosevelt has been seeking.

Frequently heretofore the Power Trust regulated its regulators. In regulating them and failing to regulate itself it ruined its investors, robbed its consumers. It did about everything but kill the goose that laid the Power Trust's golden eggs.

Economic waste flourished side by side with financial profiteering and political oppression. These abuses must be suppressed in planning for the truly electrified America which the Roosevelt administration is beginning to build.

The abuses and the peril inherent in the Power Trust holding companies are illustrated forcefully by Mr. McNinch and his fellow commissioners in a decision affecting the Byllesby system, which boasts assets of $1,200,000,000 and has dependent upon it for utility service 1,648 communities.

This system the Commission aptly characterizes as a "holding company dynasty—not exceptional but typical—with absentee ownership and management and sovereignty over far-flung dominions in many States, but subject to the direct jurisdiction of none."

In the claim of cost of a water-power project submitted by a system subsidiary, the Commission disallows $3,285 spent upon a banquet, saying:

"Consumers may not properly be required to pay for hospitality they do not share."

It might justly say the same of investors.

Disallowing a fee of nearly $500,000 charged by the Byllesby interests for supervising themselves, through an affiliated corporation, while they built a power plant, the Commission notes that in 6 years the system has made, on such fees, profits of more than $10,000,000.

The Commission declares:

"Such profits resulting from holding-company control and intercorporate contracts are not only unreasonable, but shocking, when considered in the light of their direct influence upon a business affected with a public interest."

At last, apparently, we are going to have a watchman to guard the national water powers that have been grabbed by the Power Trust under long-term leases and exploited heretofore to the Power Trust's own taste.

If Congress and the State legislatures do their part, we may also curb, at least, the Power Trust's holding-company racket.

END OF THE DEPRESSION—STATEMENTS BY W. W. ATTERBURY AND HENRY FORD

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that a brief statement by Mr. W. W. Atterbury be printed in the RECORD, and also a United Press dispatch, quoting a statement by Mr. Henry Ford.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPRESSION OVER, ATTERBURY HOLDS—RAILROAD MAN URGES FAITH IN ROOSEVELT—GETS MEDAL OF PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY

The country has emerged from the depression and business is improving, Gen. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, told members of the Pennsylvania Society last night at the organization's thirty-fifth annual dinner in the Waldorf. General Atterbury received the society's gold medal for distinguished achievement.

* * * * * * *

HOLDS SLUMP IS OVER

"We are just out of the trough of the greatest depression this country and the whole world have ever seen", General Atterbury said.

"We see all sorts of 'isms' being tried in various parts of the world. There is communism, fascism, national socialism, and what not. My own conviction is, however, that in the long run, out of all these 'isms' we shall find that Americanism—old-fashioned, rugged Americanism in its best sense—will be the 'ism' that will emerge triumphant.

"What do I mean by Americanism? I mean, above all things, the maintenance of national institutions which give the largest possible opportunity for the development of the best there is in each individual. You may call this 'rugged individualism', and yet rugged individualism does not mean giving to any individual the right to pursue a life solely devoted to his own individual aggrandizement without reference to the rights and welfare of other individuals which make up our great people. But there is a very great difference between the maintenance of this kind of rugged individualism and any effort at the regimentation of individuals. I do not think the people of this country want a regimented life.

HOLDS CAPITALISM SAFE

"The popular uprising against prohibition was, in my judgment, at heart a rebellion on the part of the whole American people against any effort to interfere with the fundamentals of personal liberty.

"People tell us that this depression has shaken the very basis of capitalism. I do not believe that it has. It is in that disbelief that I have been glad to join with the great army of our American citizens who are supporting the policies of the President of the United States in his efforts to pull this country out of the depression.

"I am an enthusiastic believer in the patriotism, the courage, and the resourcefulness of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Though a strong Republican in my political affiliations, I have felt and still feel that this is no time for the assertion of political partisanship. It is time for the whole Nation to pull together behind the President.

"I do not believe it is a time for gloom. And this sentiment on my part is not whistling to keep up my courage. Business is improving. More men are being employed. Goods are moving into consumption. The purchasing power of the farmer is already vastly improved. The whole attitude of the people is changing. I am confident that next year is going to be a better business year than the one we are now completing."

"DEPRESSION OVER", FORD QUOTED, OPENING PLANT

DALLAS, TEX., January 9 (United Press).—Henry Ford is "convinced the depression is over", C. B. Ostrander said today in announcing the Dallas Ford plant will reopen February 1, employing 2,000.

Ostrander, branch manager, said the plant would open on a schedule of 250 cars a day, with a pay roll of $300,000 a month.

FIAT MONEY—VIEWS OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Associated Press summarizes the attitude of the American Federation of Labor in respect to inflation and fiat money. I ask that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIAT MONEY FEAR VOICED BY LABOR—RECOVERY GAINS CITED, BUT INFLATION MAY WIPE OUT PROGRESS, LEADERS SAY

Business year prospects for 1934 were pictured today by the American Federation of Labor as "brighter", but "overshadowed by a danger which may destroy all progress made—inflation by fiat money."

"Fear of inflation is the chief obstacle to restoration of confidence at present", the Federation said in an annual review.

* * * * * * *

"All these gains show progress, but we must not forget that in November 10,702,000 workers still had no industrial employment; that C.W.A. funds giving temporary work to 4,000,000 will be exhausted by February 15; that business is still 30 percent below normal; that the outlook is overshadowed by a danger which might destroy all progress made—inflation by fiat money.

"These business advances are due almost entirely to Government measures, not to private initiative. * * * To this Government credit we owe a large measure of our progress toward recovery. * * *

"Government credit does not replace private credit extended in the normal way through banks. Barring a revolution in our ways of doing business, we cannot expect industry to revive until credit begins to flow in large volume from banks. * * *

"To start private initiative and put back to work 10,700,000 workers still without industrial employment, business confidence must be restored. Fear of inflation is the chief obstacle to restoration of confidence at present. * * *

"The effect of fiat money inflation at present would be to take from the workers any income gains they have had and put increased wealth and power in the hands of rich property owners. Uncontrolled inflation could destroy the effects of the recovery program.

"History shows that in the past fiat money has usually been issued to meet an overwhelming Government deficit. Large Federal borrowings in the last 3 years have alarmed many who fear that the Government will not be able to pay off its debts except by issuing fiat money. * * *

"History shows no example of uncontrolled inflation in a country with a large gold reserve. Our gold stock at present is the largest of any country in the world. * * * It is far more than enough to support our present paper currency. These facts show no reason for fiat money inflation because of the public debt."

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR DICKINSON

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] before the League of Republican Clubs of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, at Cleveland, on January 6, 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a real pleasure to be present at this splendid gathering of working Republicans. If I were to ask any pledge of you tonight, it would be a reassurance of confidence in the record and the traditions of the Republican Party. The Republican Party is progressive enough for advancement and yet conservative enough for safety. Let us continue to be a party under the Constitution and not against it.

Many governments have failed, not because they did not do enough for their people but always because they attempted to do too much. The Constitution of the United States is not a restriction on liberties but rather a protection of liberties. When we exceed its privileges, we are on dangerous ground.

The Democratic legislative program may be an experimental program, but one experiment may lead to another until no retreat is possible. Experiment is leading us far astray.

Most of the problems now confronting us are the problems of the individual and of the State and its subdivisions. Yet we hear the continuous cry—"Why does not the Government do something?" We ask the Government to plant our gardens, to plow our fields, to control our industries, and run our stores. The sooner we regain the self-consciousness that these are the problems of the individual and not of the Government, the quicker a safe road to recovery will appear in the foreground.

Our party should be committed to the principle as established by our forefathers. The preamble should become our golden rule.

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

This has been revised in the "new deal" and now reads entirely differently. At the present time, if I were to write a preamble to fit into the present-day program, it would be as follows:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to test the stability of the Union, and to divide one section against the other, to endanger justice, to insure domestic discord, to retard the general welfare, to endanger the civil liberties of ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish the A.A.A., C.A.B., C.C.C., C.S.B., C.W.A., E.C.P.C., E.H.F.A., F.A.C.A., F.C.A., F.C.T., F.D.I.C., F.E.R.A., F.H.L.B.B., F.S.R.C., G.S.C., H.O.L.C., I.A.B., I.B.R.T., I.T.P.C., L.A.B., N.C.B., N.E.C., N.I.R.A., N.I.R.B., N.L.B., N.P.B., N.R.A., P.W.A., P.W.E.H.C., S.A.B., S.B.P.W., S.R.B., T.C.F.T., T.V.A."

Many of these had no foundation in legislation whatsoever. They are the result of Executive orders—illegitimate stepchildren of an ill-advised law whereby the legislative body surrendered its birthright and delegated legislative authority to the Executive of the United States. We are at present the victims of such delegated authority. Pressure on Congress put through many measures transferring authority from Congress to the Executive—a cowardly procedure. Those governing us today were not elected to office. Johnson was not elected by the vote of the business men, nor Davis by the vote of the farmers. This has all been brought about by a delegation of power.

RETURN TO FUNDAMENTALS

The Republican Party should stand for a return to fundamentals. The theory that any particular policy of any particular group is responsible for existing conditions is erroneous. The present-day depression is the result of the sins of society itself. The individual increased his expenditures; he took on extravagant habits; he gambled large stakes on uncertain gains; he lived beyond his means; he bought on the installment plan and spent next month's salary this month. This was destructive to the understrata of society itself.

The same program was adopted by the municipalities of our country. Bond issues were voted, boulevards constructed, pavings extended, buildings erected. The expansion program was such that soon the tax revenues were unable to meet the obligations. This is the reason for the demand that municipalities be permitted to take advantage of bankruptcy.

This same spirit of spending extended to the States themselves. Many of our States obligated themselves for expenditures beyond the resources of their taxpayers. In fact, it was not solely on account of the manipulations of the stock exchange—although much blame can be placed at its door—it was the gambling spirit in practically every walk of life that disintegrated our economic structure. It is this condition that forces upon the country the necessity for an economic cure. In finding such cure, the Republican Party has a keen responsibility.

PUBLIC REGULATION NO CURE

Admitting that our economic society is disorganized and that it has not been properly managed, there is nothing in the assumption that a political social control will remedy the situation. The Republican Party should stand firm in the faith for individual management and private control of business and industry. We can promote legislation curbing dishonesty and restricting monopoly.

In reply to the suggestion that political social control is necessary by reason of the conditions now existing, let us examine the record. What about various businesses that have been vested with public supervision? Let me call your attention to the fact that the railroads have had governmental supervision for a great many years. This supervision has not saved them from suffering exactly the same plight as practically every other business in the country. I might also suggest that the banking business has been supervised by the Government. Probably no business has been more mismanaged and suffered keener loss or more in prestige than the banking business of the country. But the banking business is regulated. We have bank examiners; we have a Comptroller of the Currency; we have a Federal Reserve Board. No one ever dreamed of putting either industry or commerce under so strict regulations as have heretofore been imposed upon the finances of the country.

It has been suggested that the Senate inquiry has "dropped a grappling hook into the mire of some of their (bankers) methods. Fiduciaries at the very heart of financial power and faithless to their trust * * * and insistent that a law to induce fair practice infringes the Constitution, they are the mouthpieces of the political theory that permitted such practices." But it should be remembered that during all this time these banks were under Government supervision. They were under Government regulation. Even their bylaws were submitted to the Comptroller of the Currency for approval.

Is it not therefore safe to assume that the N.R.A. with its limitations of authority will not be able to overcome private greed? It will not be able to make economic angels out of the sinners of the earth and will be no more successful in managing the business and industries of the country than the Federal Reserve Board has heretofore been in managing the banks of the country. I again contend that Government supervision is no cure for our existing ills.

I further suggest that you investigate the shipping business which has been under Government supervision. All this would indicate that Government supervision is not a remedy and gives no assurance that industry and business will not suffer the same collapse, even if supervised and assisted by the guidance of the N.R.A. or any other Government bureau or subdivision of the "brain trust."

EXPERIMENTS

Under existing conditions we need calm, deliberate judgment. Caution should be our guide. When conditions are most critical, we find a government of trial and error—all trial and mostly error. I have no patience with the man who says that the administration at least is trying something. This is no time for quack remedies. It is much safer to trust experience than experiment. We are floundering in a conglomeration of brain storms—brain storms in finance, brain storms of overproduction, and brain storms of excess food supplies—a "brain trust" campaign of prosperity promotion spending billions.

Promises—promises—promises. The Government will fix wages; the Government will raise prices; the Government will shorten hours; the Government will settle your disputes; the Government will eliminate your competitor. Business from now on is going to be one continuous round of pleasure—with profits assured and conditions ideal. Everybody is to be regimented. You are to imitate the fat merchant of the Elizabethan Age under the merchants' guild, with wealth accumulating and your trade assured.

OVERPRODUCTION

Overproduction must be stopped. Farms are to be classified and 40,000,000 acres taken out of cultivation. Factories are to be segregated—some closed and some opened. Mines are to be listed. Overproduction is the bugaboo. If too much cotton, reduce the acreage. If too many radios, give someone the monopoly, and the "brain trust" will close the other factories. Too many lawyers—close the schools. Too many doctors—close the colleges. Too many professors—close the universities. Too many people—try birth control and legalize abortion.

BUSINESS LEADERSHIP

The greatest tragedy of today is that the leadership of industry and business, which should oppose the present program of Federal regulation and control, is so irresolute and divided in what should be done. If socialism once grips American capitalism, it will never release its grasp. One of the early conceptions of social reform is that the state shall control all means of production. There is nothing new in the present-day suggestions. All these theories have been tried in one form or another and failed. But a socialist never admits defeat. He will admit that his program has not worked, but never admits that its failure is on account of a defect in the system. The failure is always because he was not permitted to go far enough and extend his program to complete control of the economic system.

Once the Government begins the task of controlling economic relationships, it must continue. One commitment leads to the next. American capitalism in its present faltering experiment with State control is playing with the buzz saw.

SOCIALIZATION

We are taking the first step in land rentals. Soon ownership will become annoying. The P.W.A. set aside 25 millions to buy marginal lands. Next we find the theory will work better where all land is owned by the Government. Renting lands, step no. 1; buying marginal lands, step no. 2; take all the land, step no. 3.

The R.F.C. is soon to ask for a longer lease on life. For what? Why, to buy gold at home and abroad. A year ago, if I had $100 in gold in my pocket, I was a law-abiding citizen; if I perchance had a pint of whisky, I was a criminal. Today, if I have the whisky I am a law-abiding citizen, but if I have the gold I am a criminal violating the law.

The R.F.C. also wants to buy preferred stock in banking institutions and, in some instances, name the officers. We are fast approaching a bank of the United States. Somebody page Andrew Jackson. Where are the advocates of State rights? The shades of Democracy grow dim when the legislative leadership of that party forsakes every tradition of Thomas Jefferson and of the South and surrender to a centralized Government control. In finance they surrender to the R.F.C., in industry to the N.R.A. in agriculture to the A.A.A.

When this happens, big business becomes the master. Big business dictates your finance. Big business dictates your codes. The antitrust law is suspended, and corporate control of business knows but one god—the "god of profit." The whole development of business under such control is for big business to become bigger, and the little fellow hunts a place in the breadline. Surely the "Frankenstein of monopolistic capitalism" is with us.

The ultimate burden of such a program falls on two classes—the consumer and the taxpayer. One group fixes wages, profits, and prices; another must pay the bill. One group sells its produce to the Government in the form of a loan; another must pay the price. How long can our Government last half subsidized and half victimized?

MONETARY POLICY

The present uncertainty of the administration's monetary policy forces capital investment into hiding. New capital issues in 1933 will be under $1,000,000,000 as against $1,600,000,000 in 1932, $8,000,000,000 in 1930, and $10,000,000,000 in 1929. No prosperity can be realized unless new capital issues rise to at least $5,000,000,000 a year. It is impossible to supplant this money with Government funds.

A great deal has been said about the Government being able to refinance all its loans to date. Naturally, the Federal Government can force the banks to buy its bonds and then new issues can be made against the bonds; but if you follow this policy indefinitely, you turn our banks into Government printing presses. Once this device is carried to any considerable extent, the dollar may be expected to take a nose dive, and the descent will know no end. There is only one remedy for excessive expenditures, and that is additional taxation.

PARTY PROMISES AND PERFORMANCES

In reading the platforms of the major political parties during the last campaign, I find included in one of them the following:

"We favor an immediate appropriation of $5,000,000,000 for relief to supplement State and local expenditures and the appropriation of an equal amount for public works, including roads, reforestation, slum clearance, and housing."

I read further and find that this party favors "the creation of national, regional, and State boards to determine the best utilization of rural land; Government ownership of the liquor business; abolition of the power of the Supreme Court to pass on the constitutionality of legislation enacted by Congress; complete acquisition of the Federal Reserve banks by the Government; the operation of the power industry by administrative boards; the recognition of Soviet Russia", etc.

In all candor, I ask you to compare the program of the present administration as enacted by the special session of Congress and as now being proposed in the regular session of Congress with the program above suggested. But wait—I have been reading to you from the national platform of the Socialist Party, headed by Norman Thomas, who received less than 800,000 votes in the last election. None of these provisions was found in the Democratic platform that received over 22,000,000 votes, and none of them was included in the Republican platform that received over 15,000,000 votes.

Are the American people being given what they voted for, or are they being subjected to the whims of the "brain trust" led by the theorists with a direct and definite leaning to the left on every proposal?

The Republican Party must do its part in directing the affairs of this Government. No one knows whether we are still relieving the depression or revolutionizing our form of government. There may be a place where we can call a halt. We find that when direct authorization of Congress has not been granted the power has been assumed by some corporation or agency set up under some provision transferring power to the Executive.

Just now they propose to spend $25,000,000 to buy regional lands. That matter was never discussed before Congress. It is proposed to expand construction in many ways on many projects that have not been heretofore authorized by Congress. In fact, there is a refusal on the part of the leading members of the Appropriations Committee of the House to concur in many of the authorizations granted by the Public Works Administration.

We expand our highway system; we rebuild our Navy; we put 10 million dollars in flying equipment; we are encouraging municipalities, counties, and States to embark upon a system of extravagant public expenditure and pay excessive prices in order to secure a contribution from the Government; but in the end the taxpayers of these respective localities must bear the upkeep of these improvements.

The other day an editor friend of mine suggested: "A successful man hereafter will be one who can think up ways to make money as fast as the Government can take it away from him."

DEPRESSION

We are now facing a $7,000,000,000 Budget. The revenues of the Government, with all the additional taxation suggested, will not exceed 3½ billion dollars. Spending a lot of money seems to be an inspiration to spend more. This in face of the definite promise July 30, 1932, when President Roosevelt said:

"Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits.

"Our party sees clearly that not only must Government income meet prospective expenditures but this income must be obtained on the principle of ability to pay.

"Revenues must cover expenditures by one means or another. Any government, like any family, can for a year spend a little more than it earns. But you and I know that a continuation of that habit means the poorhouse."

The present type of expenditures is extravagant and wasteful. Thirty-four agencies have been set up under temporary authorizations, all of them for the purpose of spending money. The Republican Party has a direct responsibility at least to warn the country that the end of this path is Federal bankruptcy and financial ruin.

Every depression passes through three stages. First, the panicky stage of severe decline and loss of confidence and depreciated values. We have passed through that stage. With the rest of the world following a similar course, there was no way by which this could be avoided in this country. All legislation could do was to stem the tide and cushion the fall.

The second stage for every depression is a period where we test out all forms of remedies—a few of them sound, many of them unsound. The character of the leadership determines whether or not we try many quack remedies and suggested panaceas, or whether we permit experience to be our guide and confine recovery legislation to remedies fundamentally sound and tested by experience.

It is well to compare the efforts of America with those of England under the present stress. In the United States we are spending money to bring back prosperity. In England they are saving it for the same reason. Naturally, both methods will make some progress. In Great Britain they ask no emergency or extraordinary powers. It is well to remember that the stability of the English course has weathered many tests. In America we are sending up a trial balloon. No one can now predict the expected landing.

But it has been said that if we can increase the economic turnover in the United States from $45,000,000,000 to $90,000,000,000 the matter of a few additional billion dollars indebtedness will be incidental. The only trouble is the suggested "if." Suppose we go into debt the billions of dollars and do not increase the economic turnover and must follow the English course of slow, plodding recovery, but still have the indebtedness to pay. It is my judgment that that is about where the present policy will lead us.

The third stage of every depression (and in this the Republican Party is interested) is the convalescent period. Things do finally settle down. Values become fixed. Confidence is again restored, and in the end capital again begins to reach out. Every handicap by way of restrictive legislation, every uneconomic nostrum that is imposed upon the public, every time additional restrictions are placed on business, every time you bind an individual with red-tape government regulations, you delay the recovery period as suggested.

To me it seems perfectly plain that the Republican Party should immediately commit itself to a restoration of the Government to fundamentals and that our fight should be made along this line.

BUREAUCRACY

The Democratic platform in 1932 said:

"We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of Government expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance * * *."

President Roosevelt on July 2, 1932, said:

"As an immediate program of action we must abolish useless offices."

He further said:

"I accuse the present administration of being the greatest spending administration (meaning the Republican administration) in peace times in all our history * * *."

Let me suggest that the last report of the Civil Service Commission shows that we have the largest number of Federal employees on the pay roll since war times; that we have more commissions and more bureaus and more administrators than ever have been known to our Government. We have a $7,000,000,000 budget facing us. This cannot be explained away by the suggestion that we are fighting an emergency. The same emergency faced us when these promises were made in 1932 that faces us now. These same conditions were known to the Democratic Party and to its leadership. The promises made to get votes are at variance with the performances.

In fact, I look in vain for the fulfillment of the promises in the Democratic platform, but find many promises of the Socialist platform being carried out to the letter. Let me say to the merchant, let me say to the farmer, let me say to the industrialist this is no longer an emergency program, but a permanent program of political economic control. The President's message reads: "That we have created a permanent feature of our modernized industrial structure and that it will continue under the supervision but not the arbitrary dictation of government itself."

CONCLUSION

If, in this program that I have just described, representative government is to be displaced, if emergency relief is to bring a permanent revolutionary and socialistic change in our form of government, if our lands and forests are to be collectivized, if our Budget is to be forced out of balance, if we are to be subjected to every form of panacea that the human mind can suggest, then there is a heavy responsibility on the opposition party represented in this gathering here tonight. We should remember and deeply realize that regardless of all the socialistic schemes that have been tried in the world, in the end nearly everybody has to work for a living after all.

So let me congratulate the Republicans of Cuyahoga County. I am glad that as said in First Kings, it can be recorded: "Yet I have left me 7,000 in Israel, all the knees of which have not bowed to Baal."

To the Republicans in Ohio and to the Republicans everywhere, as has been suggested in Isaiah: "Go set a watchman"; and of these watchmen the country will be continually inquiring: "Watchman, what of the night?"

THE BANKING INVESTIGATION—ARTICLE BY SENATOR FLETCHER

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to ask that an article written by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and published in the magazine, Today, under date of December 30, 1933; also an article entitled "Lessons of Banking Inquiry Summed up by the Chairman", published in the New York Times under date of December 31, 1933; and an editorial on the subject matter of the articles, published in the New York World Telegram under date of January 8, 1934, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Today, Dec. 30, 1933]

THE FUTURE OF THE BANKING INVESTIGATION

Early in 1932 there were doubting Thomases as to the work of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency and its duties. By propaganda and otherwise efforts were made to prejudice it in the eyes of the public and to minimize and discredit its work. The committee was accused of looking into closets for skeletons everybody knew were there, of digging up corpses which the public knew about, of tending to destroy confidence in financial set-ups, of interfering with business by muckraking, and the like.

But the public and the press as a whole, with practical unanimity, have since shown confidence in the committee. Today all questions of our purpose and the usefulness of our work has disappeared. Those who formerly criticized and undertook to sneer now admit that the work has been well worth while and that there is real need for reforms, corrections, and changes.

It is impossible to understand the significance of the present hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency without going back into earlier Congresses. There have been many previous hearings on financial and economic subjects in both Senate and House without apparently reaching the public consciousness.

In 1913–14 the Pujo hearings, concerned with the so-called "Money Trust", were carried through laboriously under the questioning of Samuel Untermeyer, without producing marked results. Between 1913 and 1932 dozens of hearings in Congress as to stock exchanges, short-selling in general, economics in general, and banking problems have been held. They are scarcely remembered by the public.

It was the shock of the stock-market collapse in 1929 that ultimately led to the assignment of our duty and that prepared public opinion for a sympathetic reception of our work.

The committee has acted under three major resolutions of the Senate. The first of these, Senate Resolution 84, covered the following broad details:

A resolution to thoroughly investigate practices of stock exchanges with respect to the buying and selling and the borrowing and lending of listed securities, the values of such securities, and the effects of such practices.

Hearings under that resolution have continued from April 11, 1932, to the present day. They have involved long cross-questioning of Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, as to short-selling and other stock-exchange practices. His attitude at the beginning was almost flippant as to the technicalities of stock-exchange practices, but he has since shown an admirable spirit of cooperation.

It is not necessary or possible to mention all other persons brought in for examination. Reference can, however, be made to Percy A. Rockefeller, who testified as to his participation in various pools, syndicates, and joint accounts that involved no motive of increasing the wealth of the United States; to the testimony of F. H. LaGuardia, now elected to the mayoralty of New York City, and the evidence which he produced of publicity in newspapers and publications of New York and other cities purchased by gifts of stock to publicity agents; to the testimony of Walter E. Sachs regarding the Goldman-Sachs Co., the Goldman-Sachs Trading Corporation and other investment trusts, involving various food products, and the total operations of which resulted in a loss of $60,000,000, at least; to the testimony of Harry M. Warner and others regarding the motion-picture industry and its rapid expansion through the rush of investments from a public deluded as to the dependability of leaders in the industry; to copper stocks, both domestic and foreign.

Under the authority of the same original resolution the Kreuger & Toll investigations showed Donald Durant, as representing Lee Higginson & Co., in the unfavorable light of directing a $50,000,000 investment without ever attending a directors' meeting. These hearings were held on January 11 and 12 of the present year, but still under the authority of the Seventy-second Congress. Then came the Insull hearings from February 15 to 17, inclusive. At this point it is right to say that the testimony showed the creation of so many organizations pyramided on each other as to be beyond the comprehension of Owen D. Young, of the General Electric Co., as he testified, and beyond the control of Samuel Insull, Sr., before he and his brother, Martin Insull, temporarily left the United States.

Under the same resolution investigation showed the complicated weaknesses of the National City Bank in its relation to its affiliate, the National City Co. These revelations began to impress the public as a whole with the fact that this committee and its researches were approaching practical results that could safeguard the investing public. It was these hearings that fully showed up the wrong of bank directors having control of commercial deposits and yet having direct personal interest, not only in stock investments, but in stock speculation of the most arrant character. I do not hesitate to mention here the undoubted fact that the testimony of Charles E. Mitchell in February of this year will prove to have been the turning point in the willingness of right-thinking people to purify the financial activities of the United States not only as affecting banks, banking practices, and bank speculation but also as effecting stock-exchange practices as hereafter to be kept distinct from banking practices.

The other major resolutions under which this committee has operated are Senate Resolutions 56 and 97, which gave our committee authority to investigate the matter of banking operations and practices and the issuance and sale of securities and the trading therein. From that authority we have secured for the public a full understanding of the operations of investment bankers, very specifically J. P. Morgan & Co. and Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Out of the Morgan hearings came the testimony of O. P. Van Sweringen, proving in the main that by means of a credit or loan of $1,000,000, the Van Sweringens were able to build up, with the contributions of the speculative public, that which can best be described as a "railroad kingdom." The Van Sweringens used various corporate forms, some of them confusing to the public, because they operated under various names of investment trusts and holding companies, one of them at least designed to evade the tax laws of the United States.

Out of the Kuhn, Loeb testimony came a surprising revelation regarding the Pennroad Corporation that, in the form of an investment trust, actually contravened the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to a consolidated management of certain railroad systems that should have remained separate in their control. Here again the holding company plays its part.

Under Senate Resolutions 56 and 97 also, we have investigated Dillon, Read & Co. and have shown, in part at least, the conditions by which the public of America were misled in both United States and foreign securities.

The Chase Bank hearings just completed brought evidences into light that the errors and evils of banking affiliates as opened up by the National City Bank hearings, had already affected, in advance of new legislation, the banking thought of America, leading to the gradual termination of affiliates in liquidating their resources and to their immediate elimination so far as new business or endeavor was involved.

It is expected the hearings will be concluded by or during January 1934. Because our final report will not be available till then it would be premature even to outline the possible conclusions of the committee.

However, some definite results in the form of valuable and important legislation already written into law by Congress have grown out of the hearings. They should be mentioned here.

First is the National Banking Act of 1933, which contains restrictions against loans for speculative purposes. It will be recalled that in 1929, funds were drawn from banks in all portions of the country and were syphoned into New York to the extent of billions of dollars, attracted by high rates of interest, reaching at times above 20 percent. These were known as "brokers' loans" and went into speculation in stocks and other securities. The Banking Act will check or stop this sort of thing.

We found the operation of banks through affiliates was a dangerous, vicious thing. In dozens of ways we established the need of separating affiliates from commercial banks. The functions of investment trusts and trading corporations are entirely distinct and outside real banking. Commercial banks should be and must be confined to their legitimate functions. This act takes care of that. It may be amended to go further, as the head of a large national bank now recommends.

The second act passed at the last session, based largely on developments by the committee, is known as the "Securities Act of 1933."

Of course, it was to be expected that such a reformatory and far-reaching piece of legislation would meet with a storm of criticism by those whom it was designed to reach and restrain or put out of business as enemies to the investing public.

The kind of recovery the majority of stock brokers have wanted and now want is that which depends for its progress upon the ups and downs of the market, leading to active sales such as prevailed during the boom of 1929.

If this act serves as a legal safeguard against trading in and out, it is well. (It should be understood that I distinguish clearly between investment for income on one hand, and speculation for gain without any performance of service on the other.)

The recovery we want is a slower and more healthy recovery—not the result of frenzied finance for the benefit of stockbrokers and their clerks. An increased demand for products and services, rather than securities, is what is needed. In fact, the drain of cash and credit resources into speculation is very largely to blame for the inability now to produce or to buy things of use. The country was overfed on securities prior to the crash of October, 1929—some good, some bad, and some indifferent. Acute indigestion followed. The volume of capital issues of stocks and bonds of domestic corporations exclusive of Federal, State, and municipal issues, reached a total of $8,002,004,000 in the peak year of 1929. The loss to the public resulting from that unloading would be found stupendous.

It is not to be wondered at, after the experience of 1929 and 1930, that the aggregate of such issues in the first 11 months of 1933 dropped to $145,000,000. Yet there will be no difficulty in raising long-time funds by or for legitimate industry, guided by honesty and put forth in good faith. As the American Banker stated in a recent editorial, "Sound ideas, not long-time credit, is lacking. It is not the credit funds that are scarce, but, rather, good borrowers are lacking." An experienced banker and expert was asked at one of our hearings what new industries were needing long-term financing. He could not name any, though he finally mentioned the radio industry as a possibility.

The business of underwriting securities does not look so attractive as it did to many former fiscal agents, and the reason is the Securities Act. Some of them in the past put their selfish purposes above ethics and fair dealing. Some directors of corporations pocketed their fees as recompense merely for the use of their names, as was shown by H. L. Stuart in the Insull hearings, and more particularly by Samuel Insull, Jr., who did not know how many corporations he directed, but did pocket over $100,000 a year in salaries and fees. Such men hesitate now to bring themselves to incur the new responsibilities imposed by the Securities Act. They do not like to be subjected, as the sponsors of a security offered to investors, to fitting and proper liabilities.

This complaining about the alleged drastic provisions of the act is unreasonable. Opponents really want to be left free to do as they have done in the past. They overlook its exemptions and magnify the penalties—as if the act would be worth anything without the penalties. Their attitude proves that. They quail at the liabilities imposed.

Directors must understand that they have certain responsibilities to meet, that their duties are not merely perfunctory or for show-window purposes. They should realize that they hold a quasi-trust relationship to the stockholders.

If an owner sells and makes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact necessary to prevent misunderstanding, he is liable to the purchaser and may be sued for recovery of the amount which the purchaser paid or damages which he may have suffered, provided the owner cannot show that he did not know and, in the exercise of reasonable care, could not have known of such untruth or omission.

For my part, I oppose this proviso and if we amend this act at all, I would insist on its going out of the act. It affords a wide loophole for escape from all liability by reason of misrepresentation of material facts.

But there is neither time nor space to discuss fully the helpful legislation known as the "Securities Act." I hope the movement to emasculate it will be defeated.

The committee has pursued the even tenor of its way without fear or favor. It has brought to light:

1. Deplorable conditions which even those next door to them did not know about.

2. Discreditable, unethical (not to use harsh terms) practices which no honest man would continue or should justify.

The testimony shows, for example, that during the boom years of 1928 and 1929, the quoted prices of securities were almost incredible. Testimony before this committee reveals both the why and the how. The answer to the why is found in the enormous profits garnered by operators in the market. The how is arrived at by viewing the parade of pools, syndicates, trading accounts, etc., testified to by participants called before the committee. These individuals, working mainly under the cover of secrecy, aided through campaigns of the most vicious type of misrepresentation and misinformation and by being able to work with other people's money and marginal trading, manipulated the market up and down until prices of securities reached on the exchange bore no discoverable relation to the value of the properties represented. The market was churned, supported, stabilized, sagged, recovered, depressed, and revived, in the course of developing a speculative mania.

3. Greed and selfishness in dealing with the public and even between themselves, which actors in high finance (bankers even) indulged in.

4. The reason confidence had already been shaken, and to a large extent destroyed, by the abuses and performances of those conducting them, in institutions heretofore looked up to almost to the point of worship.

The committee has aroused or strengthened an enlightened public opinion respecting the rights and the wrongs in corporate investment and activities. It has awakened an understanding of self-interest among those financiers affected, so that a basis of restoration of confidence and a healthy business situation can be established and maintained; for it is evident that market places are necessary for the transfer of securities and should be continued for reasons involving the following points:

(a) Convenience of investors or the estates of investors.

(b) Access of industries to funds for either initial development or expansion, or for the replacement of obsolescent elements.

(c) For standards of values when commercial banks loan on collateral.

Therefore, the committee will justify itself before the country, I think, in having demonstrated:

That the acts of financial crooks and racketeers must be made known in order to safeguard legitimate investors.

That holes in existing laws, particularly in income-tax evasions, must be plugged as soon as possible.

That there has been a "dollar diplomacy" in relation to foreign securities, both governmental and commercial, and that the Department of State was shown to be dangerously near to passing on the merits of foreign securities.

That manipulating and rigging of markets was common practice.

In due time the hearings will be printed, and I trust provision may be made for a full index to all hearings rather than merely a final full report, for the public should for years to come know how they were tricked into their own expressions of greed in speculation.

The committee will not gloss over any of the major revelations, yet at the same time it will not defend the gambling impulses of the millions who have influenced the expansion of the securities markets.

LESSONS OF BANKING INQUIRY SUMMED UP BY THE CHAIRMAN—SENATOR FLETCHER HOLDS IT HAS TAUGHT THE PUBLIC THE PITFALLS OF SPECULATION AND INDICATED A BROAD PROGRAM OF REFORM

By DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Senator from Florida

I have been asked what 2 years of investigation by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency has disclosed. It is difficult to make an adequate reply in a brief article, for the hearings have already produced more than 5,000 pages of printed report, and not one of these pages is valueless as shedding light on stock-exchange practices, banking, and income-tax methods.

Without assuming to speak for the committee as a whole in relation to its final report, or recommendations as to remedial legislation, I can say that two valuable results have already come from our hearings.

The first of these was the cooperation of the press in informing the public of the United States regarding the main features of the hearings; making known that there is little if any chance for the public against inside manipulations of pools, syndicates, voting trusts, investments trusts, etc.

The second valuable feature comes from Federal legislation growing out of the hearings during their progress. The Securities Act of 1933 and the Banking Act of 1933 were both related to our hearings. Both may need strengthening, but neither should be weakened; for all evidence points to greater rather than less supervision as being necessary.

A WARNING TO MILLIONS

An invaluable influence of our hearings yet remains to be brought forth; for the outstanding features of our final report must necessarily serve as a warning to the millions of the United States who have been inclined to stock-market speculation and who have lost billions of their resources thereby.

We shall be able to show that the average person, remote from stock exchanges, has not one chance in a hundred to make profit in the long run from speculation. A witness made this statement in one of our hearings:

"I do not think as a rule people get right down to the fundamentals of markets. The best definition that I know of what makes a bull market and a bear market is given in a book by Walter Bagehot, who was, as you know, governor of the Bank of England and wrote Lombard Street: 'When a lot of very stupid money gets into the hands of a lot of very stupid people, you are going to have inflation and speculation and boom; and when a lot of very foolish people have spent a lot of very foolish money, you are going to have deflation, depreciation, and panic.'"

BLAINE ON SPECULATION

Senator BLAINE, in one of our hearings, quoted President Hoover on speculative fevers as follows: "In such cases 99 percent of the capital raised comes from persons who buy shares, not on any knowledge of the enterprise beyond its market nickname but because of the fullness of hope that they may resell the shares to some other outsider on the following morning at a higher price."

Furthermore, we shall be able to show that stockbrokers, as a whole, are interested scarcely at all in forms of permanent investment, but are chiefly interested in stirring up market activities—in and out, buying and selling, lifting and depressing prices, etc.—so as to secure fees or commissions for buying and selling.

We shall also be able to show that the public mind has been influenced in the past few years by "old counselors" (see Halsey, Stuart & Co. testimony), by college professors, by creditable and discreditable periodicals, and by tipster sheets, market circulars, etc., seeking to persuade the public away from permanent investment in bonds to speculation in stocks. Between January 1 and December 31, 1929, 1,124,990,980 shares were traded in the New York Stock Exchange at an estimated gross result in commissions of $191,248,553. Commissions on bonds during the same period were estimated at $7,550,000.

We shall also be able to show that through new financial devices the investor himself has been pushed further and further away from any voice or control in some of the larger corporations, through voting trusts, pyramiding corporations on corporations, and investment trusts. In this direction nothing quite so disturbing was shown as the intercorporate holdings of the Insull group; Samuel Insull, H. L. Stuart, and Samuel Insull, Jr., being voting trustees for the securities of corporations in many parts of the United States, running up to several hundred millions of dollars, all under one control or contributing to that control.

Just to name a few will refresh the public mind: The Corporation Securities Co. of Chicago, Insull Utility Investments, Inc.; Public Service Trust, Public Service Subsidiary Corporation, Utilities Securities Co. There were dozens of others, including Insull, Son & Co., Inc.

BANKING AFFILIATES

In connection with our justifiable denunciations of such financial schemes and methods we shall mention as fully as necessary the banking affiliates whose operations by the same set of officers, in control of the banks and of the affiliates, handled, contrary to the interest of the public, the public's funds for speculation in definite stocks, including in some cases the stock of the banks themselves, regardless of the interest of the bank's stockholders or depositors.

The testimony of Charles E. Mitchell, as chairman of the board of the National City Bank, was a scandalous page in the history of positions of financial trust. The testimony of Alfred H. Wiggin as to his relations with the Chase National Bank and its affiliate was equally shocking.

Promotion schemes show in some cases a purely artificial set-up, the expenses or profits of which the investing as well as the speculative public pay for. The testimony of Dillon, Read & Co., and others, for instance, regarding the handling of foreign and general securities, showed such operations as these: Purchasing syndicates, distributive syndicates, trading accounts, and direct retailing to individuals, so that the purchaser under pressure of the market has paid profits on methods that have no relation at all to the intrinsic value of the securities he buys.

THE VAN SWERINGENS

For testimony along such lines the public should read of the Alleghany Corporation as floated by the Van Sweringens through J. P. Morgan & Co.; the Pennroad Corporation as floated through Kuhn, Loeb & Co. This method of piling up costs was particularly shown in the floating of foreign securities, which leads me to refer to the stupid, I might say, astounding testimony of Donald Durant, who represented Lee, Higginson & Co. in marketing the Kreuger-Toll securities. He testified that he was the one American director and that he never attended a directors meeting in connection with that $50,000,000 flotation, or at any time.

One of the worst defects of stock-exchange activities was shown up in certain cases where the securities of corporations continued to be traded in by stockbrokers for purchasers after the corporation itself had gone into a receivership or become bankrupt.

This cautionary word is, however, necessary in advance of our final report: There are in the United States several hundred thousand legally chartered corporations—403,173 submitted balance sheets for 1930 to the Treasury Department in connection with their income-tax returns. Their capital stock represented $106,184,000,000.

Possibly not more than 3,000 of these corporations are listed in stock-exchange activities of the United States. The vast majority of them are represented by local interests, where the investor can see his property and knows personally the men or group of men responsible for administering that property. If I were for a moment to indicate that the reasons for individual confidence in other individuals have ceased to be justified in the United States, I should be foretelling Nation-wide disaster and the end of our form of civilization built on mutual trust.

These things are certainly indicated, as related to the final report:

1. There is need for a method to make accessible to the investing public everywhere frequent reports on corporate activities. Such a change cannot be brought about effectively except through Federal action; for corporations are artificial beings created by States, and there is no uniform law of incorporation or of control in the 48 States and the District of Columbia.

AN OVERSEAS EXAMPLE

The British Companies Act deserves our earnest consideration as effecting corporate morality. In England every corporation is under the control of the Government from its inception to its end. Hence our Securities Act cannot in every detail follow the British Companies Act.

2. Pitiless publicity should surround the operations of syndicates, pools, etc., if such methods of affecting the market continue at all. The hearings showed no public value to any such scheme. The real interest of the stock exchange is involved in this question.

3. Through the cooperation of all exchanges, buying on margin, if continued at all, should be continued under strict control, so as to prevent mere gambling and the massing of depositors' moneys from over the Nation in the form of brokers' loans. In September 1929 brokers' loans in New York were $8,500,000,000; in November 1929 they were $4,000,000,000.

4. Corporations should be strictly held to the specific purposes for which they were created.

5. Directors should be compelled to direct; for they are quasi-trustees and represent the morality required of a trusteeship. As recommended by Mr. Aldrich, officers of a bank should be required to disclose all their personal loans above a nominal amount to the board of the bank. Officers of the bank should be prohibited from participating, directly or indirectly, through dummies or otherwise, in syndicates, trading accounts, and pools. Officers should be compelled to disclose to their boards all their outside business and financial transactions. They should not be permitted to use the bank to favor outside interests.

No officer should be permitted to occupy the position of serving two masters.

No man should be allowed to appeal to the public to buy securities about which he is unwilling to tell the truth.

PRICES AND VALUES

Assuming that this brief statement regarding the hearings before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency will be read by several hundred thousand people, it seems to me very appropriate to invite the sober-minded people of the United States to recognize the difference between prices and values. Our hearings—as the public is well aware—have shown that prices of securities other than bonds rose to a ridiculous height in 1929.

In fact, so ridiculous was the speculative fever that stocks with no par value and with no dividends in sight or promised or declared went up to $150 or more. The shares of Insull Utility Investments, Inc., were just such a type, reaching $149, and the testimony of H. L. Stuart, of Halsey, Stuart & Co., was that the public would have taken vastly more Insull securities than were offered because they believed in Samuel Insull and were hypnotized by his financial empire.

To carry the thought further, various constituent-operating utilities in the Insull set-up were then and still are earners of dividends, and hence have value. This is true of every well-founded, well-managed corporation in supplying the needs of the consuming public. Therefore the prices reached in a bull market—a market constantly rising higher and higher—do not affect permanent values one way or the other, and hence sensible people of the United States must cease watching speculative stock prices every morning to know if America is prosperous, or recovering, or what not.

FALL IN STOCK VALUES

In September 1929 the stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange had a quoted market price of $97,000,000,000. In May 1932 the same stocks had a quoted market price of $14,000,000,000. While the shrinkage of $83,000,000,000 represented losses to speculators that had appalling effects on public confidence, nevertheless the quoted price in May 1932 was no statement of genuine values.

If the millions become familiar with the teachings involved in our final report, the influence of these hearings will extend for years and stop foolish people from slaving and toiling in order to save up for speculation. The same influences of the press that have made the hearings familiar to the public will be counted upon by the committee when its report is submitted to the Seventy-third Congress.

But when all is said as to what might be done or should be done, this important fact remains—no rules, regulations, laws, restrictions, or whatnot can prevent a man from being a fool or a knave if he chooses to be a fool or a knave.

[From the New York World Telegram, Jan. 8, 1934]

THE WHOLE STORY

President Roosevelt, in his message, paid high tribute to the banking and stock-market investigation of the Fletcher Senate committee by his blistering condemnation of the financial racketeering thus far disclosed.

They call, the President declared, on the strong arm of the Government for their immediate suppression; they call also on the country for an aroused public opinion. He asked for stringent preventive or regulatory measures.

The country has been aroused. So has Congress. They should be kept aroused until Congress has legislated wisely, effectively, and thoroughly. To accomplish these objectives the Fletcher committee should continue until the whole story is laid on the record. Much has been told. But much remains to be told.

President Roosevelt's denunciation of reckless speculators was even stronger in his message to Congress than in his inauguration address when he stirred the country by his pledge to "drive the money changers from the temple." That is easy to understand.

He and the country have learned many bitter facts since—how Albert H. Wiggin attempted to use the world's largest bank for his own speculations; how Wiggin and other so-called "giants of the boom era" alternately puffed and deflated the market at their will to reap fortunes at the expense of the unwary and uninitiated; how Clarence Dillon got control of millions of other people's money by shoe-string investments; how a group of banks in Detroit were ruined by fancy promotion and thus set off the explosion which rocked the Nation; how the House of Morgan extends its financial control into the lives of nearly every citizen.

This is not the whole story. Chairman FLETCHER, who has promised "to go the limit", is prepared to get it all. The veteran legislator resisted successfully those who sought to stop the inquiry a few months ago. He deserves the support of the country for his faithful public service and his determination to complete the job.

The lamb in the 1929 crash wants to know how the New York Stock Exchange operated in those high-flying days—and why. The Senate committee next will address itself to this task.

The Fletcher committee's inquiry perhaps has shocked none more than honest bankers. As evidence of guilty consciences in high financial circles, they have seen shake-ups in command of the Nation's big banking institutions. These honest bankers want the whole story, too, for it affects their business.

THE NEGRO AND THE N.R.A.—ADDRESS BY JAMES J. HOEY

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by Hon. James J. Hoey, United States collector of internal revenue at New York City, on Sunday, December 31, 1933, on the subject of the Negro and the N.R.A.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is indeed a privilege to participate in this joint discussion concerning the welfare of the Negro on the subject of "The Negro and the N.R.A." I feel particularly honored that I have been chosen as the first speaker to open the subject which I am sure our listeners-in will regard as a very important national question. I say national, because the grave problems confronting the Negro are not so much racial as they are interracial. This problem, affecting the lives and destinies of 12,000,000 American citizens, is both national in its scope and consequences and deserves the interest and cooperation of all Americans.

May I at this time be permitted to say as a former member of the State legislature and one who has been in close touch with State and city problems for many years, that I have acquired an interest and knowledge of the many social, industrial, and economic problems of the Negro. For more than 30 years I have had an intimate acquaintance with the many colored citizens in this part of the country and am familiar with the many undertakings launched in the interest of the Negro. May I say, in a word, that I have both a sympathetic attitude and an understanding interest.

I realize that the Negro is confronted with a host of problems which concern and affect the progress and the future of the race, and yet it seems to me that the most serious and far-reaching problem, one which demands an early solution, is that of occupational opportunity and employment. The field for vocational opportunity for the Negro who is equipped with a higher education and the opportunities for employment in the various trades and industries are distressingly limited and restricted. While this problem dates back to the time of the Emancipation Proclamation, it has become infinitely more serious during our present economic depression.

Some months ago I made an investigation of the unemployment problem among our Negro citizens in Harlem and was alarmed to find that the unemployment of the Negroes in our own city is more than 60 percent. Incidentally, I am informed that in some cities it is as high as 90 percent. I have learned that wherever there is a condition of unemployment the Negro is the first to be fired, and as conditions improve he is the last to be rehired. I find that this condition is Nation-wide; that Negroes as a group are the greatest sufferers in the depression and do not receive the benefits of employment under the N.R.A. In fact, the minimum-wage provision of the N.R.A. operates to the distinct disadvantage of the Negro.

For example, where an employer had a Negro elevator operator at $10 a week, finding himself forced by law to pay a minimum wage of $15 weekly, he fires the colored man and hires a white man to take his place. I realize that this condition could not have been foreseen during the enactment of the law, and yet the fact remains that the National Industrial Recovery Act up to the present time has been of no advantage to the Negro. That is all the more reason why some other steps should be taken to help the Negro.

At the present time, the number of vocational and occupational opportunities for the thoroughly qualified Negro is so limited that we find the Negro college graduates are forced to accept employment in the most menial capacities, as porters, cleaners, and elevator operators, and yet tens of thousands of our Negro youths are today attending colleges with high hopes of the future but with little chance of being able to utilize their education in their chosen field of endeavor.

How many of my listeners realize the very high percentage of Negroes, with one or more college degrees, to be found among the porters carrying hand luggage in many of our large terminals? These men are ambitious and industrious, and, of course, would vastly prefer to make use of their education, but they are compelled to accept whatever employment is open to them. For one I deplore the injustice of this situation. Indeed there is something fundamentally wrong when the employers of America are not aware of the justice and necessity of opening the doors of opportunity so as to provide new fields of employment and of increasing the number of Negro employees.

While I am in favor of higher education for the properly qualified youth of every race in America, I feel that the most important problem for those individuals, associations, and foundations interested in the future of the Negro is this question of opportunity. These associations should, for the time being at least, suspend their interest in higher education and devote their efforts principally to the task of creating wider opportunities of endeavor and employment for the Negro, and impress upon the employers of America the necessity of giving the colored race a just and proportionate share in the opportunities of employment. I feel that the Negro youth, before he makes the sacrifice involved in seeking a higher education, should be made aware of the fact that only rarely do the Negro graduates of our colleges find their proper place in business or in the professions for which they are so well equipped.

I am not advocating that the Negro group be restricted to the various trades and industries. They are, they should, and they will continue to achieve high places in the arts and professions. But I insist that something is wrong when we find that the greatest endeavor is made to provide higher education for the more talented minority and at the same time comparatively little is being done to encourage and assist the great majority in securing education and training in the trades, industry, and agriculture. Furthermore, almost no effort, commensurate with the great need, is made to augment and increase the number of occupations available to the Negro employees. Up to now no adequate appeal has been made urging the employers of America to employ a just and fair proportion of Negroes, both in clerical positions and in the ranks of skilled and unskilled labor.

It is not necessary for one to pose as an authority on the question of the Negro in agriculture, in order to maintain that if there were more Negroes with proper and adequate agricultural training there would be fewer poverty-ridden Negro tenant-farmers and more successful farm owners, and a higher rate of wage for Negro farm hands in the rural sections of the country. Also, there would be less racial despair and more hope and contentment, as well as an improvement in the standards of living.

Although this may be called good economics and sound sense, it is essentially a question of opportunity and justice. As has been well said by a leading sociologist—

"Nothing is so dangerous for a country as when a considerable number of men come up against a wall of despair of their future progress. Next to that is the danger when any considerable number of men get the idea that there is no opportunity. On the other hand, nothing makes a man work and strive like the open door of opporunity. The chance or the hope of improving one's conditions is a tonic to anyone to work and serve. The importance of the idea of opportunity in American citizenship must be obvious."

I suggest that the various philanthropic groups, institutions, and educational foundations, such as the Carnegie Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the Phelps-Stokes Fund, investigate this great problem. They should make a survey to determine all the facts and publish their findings and recommendations. Thereafter they should lead an extensive campaign of education among the employers and industrial leaders of America to the end that the neglected Negro majority may, in greater numbers, secure the essential opportunity of employment and livelihood and the chance of promotions and advancement, each in his own field of occupation.

In conclusion let me say that such a program carried to a successful completion would prove the greatest single achievement in racial justice for the Negroes in America since the Emancipation Proclamation of the Great Liberator, Abraham Lincoln.

ESSENTIAL UNEMPLOYMENT LEGISLATION

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some speeches made at a conference on essential unemployment legislation, called by the Joint Committee on Unemployment and held in Washington, December 9, of last year.

There being no objection, the speeches were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROGRAM FOR NATIONAL ASSISTANCE

(By H. L. Lurie, Director, Bureau of Jewish Social Research, New York City)

The necessity for relief of the unemployed is an acknowledgment of our failure to organize our economic life with intelligence and to provide opportunities for productive effort on the part of the total laboring population. An acceptance of this basic fact is fundamental to planning unemployment relief. Hastily conceived and executed emergency relief measures may be necessary as expedients to alleviate suffering and to avoid economic collapse. These plans should be judged, however, on the basis of the contribution which they make to an intelligent and socially desirable organization of economic affairs and public welfare. To continue on the assumption that all measures are of an emergency and temporary nature is exceedingly fatuous. We must grasp the realistic fact that we are engaged in a process of reorganization of public welfare as well as of economic affairs, and that in the emergency relief measures we are laying the groundwork for our continuing social and welfare policies.

It needs to be emphasized that the United States does not possess an adequate system of public welfare and relief. What we have instead is an antiquated and haphazard aggregation of poor-relief services which represent, in general, an unsatisfactory and socially inadequate method of dealing with the problems of individual and family need. This traditional system of local poor relief presenting wide variations in the administrative practice and in standards of welfare has been modified in some sections of the country by more recent developments of special relief for dependent mothers, the aged, and other classes of dependents. There has also been in recent years some improvement in administration of local relief, but for the most part the basic character of poor relief remains unchanged. Destitute individuals and their families who become the recipients of aid are treated as though they were primarily personal failures and incompetents. Institutional care typified by the almshouse still remains the basic approach of public poor relief in too large an area in this country, although in recent years there has been considerable extension of the method of home relief in the larger urban centers. Infrequently is there an attempt to provide assistance which measures up to a decent standard of living. Relief in most instances follows the pernicious doctrine of "less eligibility" inherited from previous generations. This means that the relief authorities do not endeavor to provide for the needs of individuals except upon the most minimum and niggardly basis of assistance which is insufficient in many instances to provide even the bare essentials for physical survival. This inadequacy is as frequently a matter of social philosophy as of financial limitation. While some of the qualitative aspects of poor relief have been improved and humanized by the activities of voluntary agencies, the effect upon poor relief in general has not been extensive.

In discussing the national program of relief for the unemployed, we must not lose sight of the fact that the systems of relief upon which it is being grafted are essentially haphazard and inadequate in character and based upon the outworn concepts of the individual's responsibility for his own poverty, the theory of less eligibility and of unrestricted aid. It is this system of poor relief which under pressure of the crisis assumed some degree of responsibility for the millions of destitute unemployed and their families as well as for an increased number of other classes of dependents who were forced to resort to such means for maintaining life.

The preceding session of Congress authorized and the various administrative units established by President Roosevelt are developing a program of unemployment relief which may be said to mark a constructive advance in the history of poor relief in the United States. The program began with grants of Federal money to States for their unemployment-relief activities. As compared with the loans or advances to States under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which had been the reluctant contribution of the previous administration to the problems of unemployment relief, the present measure constituted at least a realistic acceptance of Government obligation to provide resources for relief purposes. Essentially, however, the new program of Federal aid was a bolstering by the National Government of the antiquated local poor-relief systems which had reached the breaking point in many localities owing to the unavailability or exhaustion of local and State funds. There was, however, the recognition that without discarding the century-old system of local responsibility the Federal Government had a real obligation to provide funds during a period of economic stringency.

The reports of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration estimate that in March 1933 the peak load of relief was attained with a total of 4,560,000 families in the United States receiving unemployment relief from public funds. Including single resident individuals and recipients of mothers' aid and old-age relief approximately 20,000,000 individual persons, one sixth of the total population of the United States, were being assisted. Based upon reports to the United States Children's Bureau from a representative number of cities, the average monthly relief per family in the industrial centers has been approximately $20 a month. There have been considerable variations in relief standards, and in many sections of the country families on relief this year have been receiving as little as from $6 to $10 a month for all forms of relief. Social-work experience offers ample evidence that low relief costs mean inadequate food budgets, lack of provision for shelter, nonpayment of rents, failure to provide clothing, medical supplies, fuel, and other essentials. Even if we were to assume that relief is being given to many families who have some additional limited income from other sources, it is doubtful whether the average expenditures of the 20,000,000 persons assisted in the United States in March 1933 can be estimated as having amounted to more than 40 percent of the previous expenditures of these families. We know too well that the standard of living which they are experiencing is similarly deficient.

It is to the credit of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration that from its inception it has helped to raise the level of relief standards through more generous appropriation, and that it has attempted to set forth minimum standards of relief, which in many States exceed the level previously attained in these localities. The F.E.R.A. has also been concerned with the problems of special classes of the unemployed, with the standards of relief administration, and has developed a program for the transient and homeless group. Through a slow and gradual process it is conceivable that the Federal Emergency Relief Administration as originally planned might have succeeded in improving the machinery of local poor relief and of raising the standards of adequacy and of administration in unemployment relief programs. Although progress has been made in a number of States, it cannot be said that standards of relief for the country as a whole at this time approach the level of minimum adequacy. There is still a long way to go in reaching a decent standard of relief and method of relief administration in a majority of the States. It is to the further credit of the administration, however, that it has not been satisfied with merely continuing the local relief programs based upon an antiquated theory of public assistance, including the makeshift programs of work relief. Within recent months more construction measures have been put into operation which indicate a tendency for progressive action in dealing with the problems of unemployment relief.

In the program of the Civilian Conservation Corps some progress was made in divorcing young members of families from the wasteful system of idleness and dependency which poor relief encourages. Conceived as an emergency measure, it is becoming obvious that changes and extensions of the program need to be made if it is to be continued indefinitely as a measure of Federal employment. The project is employing approximately 310,000 young men on a type of work which can be considered as preparing for future vocational opportunities for only a small fraction of the group. It is important, therefore, that the period of voluntary enlistment in the Civilian Conservation Corps be used for furthering educational and vocational experience. An attempt should be made to integrate the program of the Civilian Conservation Corps with the projects for public works, with the aim of supplying vocational experience leading to employment in skilled construction trades and to industrial opportunities. Diversified trade and occupational training would similarly be helpful for selected groups.

Another development in Federal relief has been the organization of the Surplus Relief Corporation for the distribution of surplus agricultural products to the unemployed and other dependent groups. This program may be said to be a crude but nevertheless a realistic attempt to resolve the paradox of destitution in the midst of plenty. Whatever may be said for the project from the point of view of economics, for example, that it is an attempt to create an illusion whereby a part of what has been produced by agriculture is supposed to be absorbed or to disappear, thus leading to the enrichment of the producers, this attempt to distribute surplus products among the unemployed is admittedly a more intelligent and socialized procedure than the expedients of plowing under, burning, dumping, and other methods of destruction which have been resorted to. One disadvantage of the surplus-relief plan, from the point of view of unemployment-relief programs, is that in some parts of the country, where cash relief has been the method of assistance, a less desirable method of relief distribution is being introduced. Instead of treating the unemployed as normal purchasers and consumers entitled to some latitude and personal judgment in the use of relief funds, the food-distribution plan makes them more definitely wards of the State, which determines their consumption habits. Where the commissary method of distribution of relief is already in existence, no radical change in method is introduced by the surplus-relief plan. Aside from disadvantages as a method of relief distribution, it must be acknowledged that the additional items of pork, peanut butter, dried fruit, etc., add to the limited dietary and inadequate food allowances of relief recipients.

Social workers regard with enthusiasm the program of the Civil Works Administration, which is now progressing rapidly. In this project we have a more modern and satisfactory plan of dealing with the millions of normal workers who have been made jobless by the depression. The Civil Works Administration is attempting to transfer 2,000,000 of unemployed from the status of relief clients receiving a meager dole, directly or on the basis of "made work", to the status of independent workers for whom the Nation is establishing normal and productive work on public projects. In addition, an equal number of work opportunities are being made available to unemployed persons not on relief, which means work opportunities for the jobless who have not yet reached the point of destitution, which makes them eligible for charitable assistance. Through civil works the test of destitution as the basis of eligibility for unemployment assistance has been eliminated, a rate of wages approximating the normal wage rate for skilled and semiskilled effort has been established, and the unemployed whom it serves are freed from the restraints of supervision and tutelage. Thus at one step the Federal Government is virtually repealing the theory of poor relief with its pernicious doctrine of destitution and of less eligibility of the indigent. No longer is the unemployed man or woman looked upon as an instance of personal maladjustment, but as a jobless worker for whom the Nation has accepted an obligation to provide an opportunity resembling normal and remunerative employment.

The plan of the Civil Works Administration has been announced as a temporary measure. We urge this Conference on Unemployment Legislation to insist upon the plan of Civil Works Administration being continued as a permanent measure of unemployment relief so long as private industry and public works combined are unable to absorb the entire potential labor power of the Nation. It has been estimated that the funds that have been made available will be exhausted by March 1. It is inconceivable that the entire surplus labor of the Nation, which may be estimated at this time as between 8,000,000 and 11,000,000 persons, will have been normally absorbed by the various developments of the recovery program within the next year. It is difficult to estimate the cost of continuing the civil-works program, but unless there is a rapid reduction in the ranks of the jobless, at least $200,000,000 a month might be required for the year 1934.

Whatever may be said in criticism of the Civil Works Administration, of shortcomings in the effectiveness and utility of the projects or of inadequacies in methods of selection and administration, the plan itself is essentially desirable and progressive so long as more radical measures of economic organization are not placed in effect. The defects of the civil-works plan, largely due to the rapidity with which it has been placed in operation, can be eliminated in time and improvements made in the nature of the projects, their social utility and efficiency, and in the methods of administration. The civil-works plan should be permanently retained as an auxiliary method of unemployment relief. It need not interfere with a desirable development and enlargement of the public-works program.

Although of outstanding importance, the Civil Works Administration is concerned with only a part of the relief and social welfare needs related to poverty and unemployment in which the responsibility and the participation of the Federal Government are required. The demoralizing effect of the depression itself has tended to increase the number of unemployable and partially employable for whom continued relief measures and constructive programs for treatment are essential. The present load of the public-relief agencies, depending in many localities largely or entirely upon Federal funds, contains many aged and superannuated individuals, heads of families incapacitated by illness and chronic disease, and broken families due to death, desertion, and hospitalization of wage earners, dependent children, and others for whom there is needed a program of public assistance more desirable than those now available under various forms of poor relief. It is impossible to draw a sharp dividing line between those in need because of unemployment and those suffering from other conditions leading to economic insecurity.

The customary programs of relief and social service which deal with the various classes of dependents and other social needs of the community have been greatly attenuated and in some instances have broken down. It has been generally acknowledged that private philanthropy was inadequate for organizing a program of relief for unemployment; it is similarly inadequate to deal with the large problems of poverty and dependency which are the casualties of our economic life. To some extent the ability of States and municipalities to provide for various dependent groups and to continue satisfactory public-welfare programs for education, hospital care, health and recreation has been affected by the dwindling of local and State resources intensified by the fact that under Federal policy and stimulation local and State resources are being diverted to the emergency program for unemployment relief. The Federal Government has demonstrated that of all governmental agencies it alone has the power to regulate economic affairs and the authority to divert national income for social-welfare purposes. It is desirable, therefore, that the principle of Federal responsibility be extended to assure to every family and every individual a minimum of economic security, irrespective of the ability of the labor market to absorb him or his own ability to become an effective participant in production.

It is important also that we recognize that an adequate program of unemployment relief should seek to repair the ravages to social institutions and public welfare which the depression has caused. We should not for a moment overlook the fact that we have reached an economy of surplus and that adequate resources are available in this country for a high standard of social well-being. We should, therefore, not be content with presenting a minimum program of relief assistance but should urge a maximum program of social reconstruction, restoring to the country the standards of living and culture which we had previously attained. For this reason the effect upon our educational institutions should be included in those matters of concern to the national recovery program. The Federal Government must accept the responsibility of restoring and maintaining our educational system. Included in educational problems there is the particular problem of provision for higher education, particularly for the youth above the age of 16, endowed with capacity for intellectual achievement. It is making poor use of our human resources to consign gifted youth to the status of jobless, unskilled labor, and blind-alley occupations. The Federal Government should be urged to subsidize State universities by providing educational scholarships for tuition and maintenance of qualified youth whose intellectual capacity makes them potential assets of a high order to the welfare of the Nation. Such a program would supplement the Civilian Conservation Corps and be available to those who qualify on the basis of merit and educational preparation.

To achieve these objectives there should be developed a program of national assistance as the keystone for State and local program of public welfare. Pending the establishment of adequate pension and insurance plans the Federal Government should subsidize and set standards for the adequate relief of various classes of dependents, including widows, dependent children, aged, and incapacitated. Relief funds of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration should be made available to the various States for these purposes.

The Federal relief plan should seek, in cooperation with States and municipalities, to provide sufficient funds to assure decent standards of living for all classes of dependents, including adequate provisions for health and medical care, and should aid in the setting up of adequate organization and administration of State and local public-welfare programs.

We recommend, therefore, as a logical development of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and related Federal projects, the establishment of a national department of public welfare to include the following functions:

First. Assurance of normal employment on governmental projects for the entire labor surplus (continuance of programs of Civil Works Administration and the Public Works Administration).

Second. Federal participation and subsidies for the relief, pensions, and service programs in the various States for mothers' aid, the aged, and disabled workers.

Third. Federal aid to programs for the care of dependent children.

Fourth. Federal aid to States and municipalities for development of services of hospital and medical care.

Fifth. Federal aid to States for programs of care of physical and mental defectives.

Sixth. Federal aid to education including maintenance scholarships for those qualified for higher education.

PUBLIC WORKS

(By M. H. Hedges, Director of Research, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers)

"Public works as an avenue to recovery has not been tried in the United States. It is not being tried today, but may be by next spring when the full impact of the present program of building may get into full swing. As an unemployment-relief measure, public works has been a godsend to union people throughout the United States during the last year and before. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has positive evidence of where local unions have been saved by public-works jobs in their communities", said Mr. M. H. Hedges, research director, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Mr. Hedges went on to give figures to show the actual expenditures in the public-works program in the United States for the last 10 years. He also presented figures, well authenticated, to show for every billion dollars of construction spent by the Government, 200,000 building-trades workers were put to work, and 400,000 workers in cognate industries were given additional employment. He touched the question of how to energize capital goods industries other than by reducing wages, and explained the relationship of the building-trades unions to the public-works organization of the Government. He said this was on the whole satisfactory.

He predicted the public works and other collectivistic programs of the Government will, and must become, a continuous process during the next 10 years.

PUBLIC HOUSING

(By Frederick L. Ackerman, Consultant, Housing Division, Public Works Administration)

Since the announcement of the incorporation of the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation many questions have been asked as to how it will function.

The Public Works Administration will continue to loan on slum-clearance operations and low-cash housing projects sponsored by public bodies and limited dividend corporations. It is the intention of the administration to undertake the work through the Emergency Housing Corporation only upon invitation from local officials or groups of representative citizens or civic organizations—where the Housing Corporation initiates, local group and agencies will be utilized to the fullest extent possible in the acquisition of sites, design, construction, and operation of the projects.

By confining the work of the Emergency Housing Corporation, at the present time, to the clearance of slum dwellings and the production of a like number of low-cost units, limited as to rentals and restricted as to occupancy to the low-income group, the administration can stimulate one of the basic industries and provide like or more employment for the sums expended.

(By Dr. Sidney E. Goldstein, of the Free Synagogue, New York, chairman the executive committee, at the conference of joint committee on unemployment, Saturday, Dec. 9, 1933, Washington, D.C.)

The Joint Committee on Unemployment has assembled in Washington to consider legislation that is now essential in our national life. Three years ago this committee, composed of 17 national organizations, presented to Congress and the President a 5-point program. Our program called for Federal relief, unemployment insurance, limitation of the hours of labor without decrease in wages, elimination of children and the aged from industry, and construction work that would include housing on a national scale subsidized and controlled by the Government. Four items of this program have been incorporated in the codes and the President's plan for recovery, but not to the extent that we have advocated.

We believe that the relief must be more adequate; that the hours of labor must be reduced to 30 per week; that the minimum wage must be sufficiently high to assure a decent standard of living for every family; that unemployment insurance must be included as a part of the national program; that child labor must be ended through an amendment to the Constitution; and that the construction program must be advanced with greater speed and our cities rebuilt, the disgrace of the slums removed, and suitable homes provided for the working classes. We believe also that the right to labor is one of the fundamental rights of man, a right just as fundamental as the right to life or liberty or the leisure in which to develop our powers and personalities. But the most urgent and acute problem that the Nation faces today in our judgment is summed up in the question that is central to the conference: How can we restore our purchasing power to the mass of workers in America?

Every layman as well as every economist understands that unless the great mass of workers possesses purchasing power it cannot buy; if the workers cannot buy, merchants cannot sell; if merchants cannot sell, farmers and manufacturers cannot engage in production. The trouble today is not that we lack purchasing power and income in the country. The total national income in the country and the total national purchasing power, even in these days of doubt, is large enough to maintain every individual and every family in the United States upon a decent and self-respecting level of life. The trouble is not in the total amount of our national income, but is found in the fact that the income of our country is inequitably and unjustly distributed. The result is that a large percentage of our people has too little, and a small percentage of the people has too much. One of the causes, perhaps the chief cause, of the economic catastrophe is that the purchasing power in America was drained out of the mass and stored up in reservoirs controlled by a few.

For a normal economic life we must have four or five economic elements. We must have material, we must have machines, we must have men, we must have markets, and we must have money. All these elements we possess today. Material we have in abundance more than we need; machinery we have in excess, much of it rusting in idleness; men we have to the number of 10 million in the armies of the unemployed; markets we have, both at home and abroad; and money we also have. But the money that we need and without which all the other elements cannot operate is dammed up in vaults and controlled by the temporary masters of our economic organization. As long as these masters remain in control there can be no redistribution in accordance with the principles of equity and justice.

The national income, we must recognize, cannot be redistributed through an increase in credit power. Credit power at the top does not filter down into purchasing power at the bottom. The income of the country, we must also acknowledge, cannot be redistributed through an increase in prices. Prices always advance faster than wages. Every increase in price means an increase in the cost of living and a consequent decrease in wages and the purchasing power of the people. There is only one way in which the national income can be justly and equitably distributed, and that is through a limitation upon the amount that each man may retain from year to year. The limitation upon income must be made upward as well as downward. There is a point below which no wage should fall as a matter of decency and justice, and there is also a point above which no income should rise, also as a matter of social justice and human decency. We must agree not only upon a minimum wage; we must also agree upon a maximum income. The minimum wage can never be high enough to be just, unless the maximum income is low enough to make justice possible. Men may call this method of redistribution of the national income confiscation; we call it conscription. In the last great emergency declared by Congress the Government conscripted our bodies and our brains. In this present emergency, no less great and serious than the last, the Government has not only the right but the duty to conscript our income and our wealth. The one question that we face in America is whether income and wealth is to be conscripted and redistributed in accordance with law and through a new and radical system of taxation or whether it will be seized and appropriated through violence and bloodshed. No legislation can save the social system that is responsible for the collapse in our economic life. This system is doomed beyond all power of redemption. But a new program of taxation that will justly redistribute the income of the people may succeed in saving us from riot, civil strife, and mass murder, and in establishing a new and just social order.

GOVERNMENT AND CHILDREN

(By Dr. John Dewey, Chairman the Joint Committee on Unemployment)

The depression has told with ferocious brutality upon children. It is depriving them of schooling and undermining their health. Two million dollars less a day are spent on education than in 1930. Two thousand rural schools are closed. On the average, the school year has been shortened from 1 to 2 months over the country, although it averaged before from a month to two months and a half shorter than in European countries. Teachers are dismissed in great number. The depression and the shutting down of child labor has resulted in sending children in greater numbers to high schools. One out of every four teachers in the United States is teaching for less than the N.R.A. codes fix for unskilled factory workers. Kindergartens are closed. Music, physical education, art, home economics, and health services are lopped off.

In 1930 President Hoover estimated there were 6,000,000 undernourished children in the United States. The Children's Bureau estimates that one fifth of the children of the country are suffering from bad nutrition, bad housing, and inadequate medical care. Official investigation shows families who suffered a loss of income between 1929 and 1932 have a 60 percent higher rate of illness than families in which there was no drop. One third of the children in a low-income region of New York City were rated poor or very poor in health by examining physicians—only one quarter good. Loss in education and health cannot be made up in later life for either child or nation. The Federal Government must come to the rescue and grant appropriations for education, scholarships, food, and care, to maintain future citizens in sound body and mind.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE CHURCH

(By Rev. Dr. R. A. McGowan, Associate Director, National Catholic Welfare Council)

One of the purposes of the N.R.A. and the Agricultural Adjustment Act is to distribute buying power better so that people may buy the goods our factories, mines, and fields can produce. The N.R.A. and A.A.A. are living up to this purpose part way. But our possible production is so great—and it is a production of staple goods—that our distribution has to be wide and high. It is not wide enough yet nor high enough.

The big trouble so far has been in the N.R.A. and the precise trouble has been the domination of most of the codes by the employers' associations. They have increased prices at the same time that they have prevented sufficient wage increases.

A change in N.R.A. procedure is imperative to bring the unions into every code authority so that they will share in administering not only wages and hours, but output and prices.

SOCIALIZATION OF INCOME THROUGH TAXATION

(By Dr. Colston Estey Warne, Economics Department, Amherst College)

Incomes which people in this country receive may roughly be divided, as one economist puts it, between earnings, findings, and stealings. The last two—findings and stealings—are large items. The mass of workers and farmers receive their income reward, small though it is, from honest effort. They earn. Regarding other incomes one cannot be so certain. For the incomes of bankers, lawyers, tradesmen, real-estate owners, coupon clippers, business executives, and absentee stockholders are heavily loaded with findings and stealings. Let us sort out the conspicuous cases in which people are today receiving incomes—substantial incomes—for which they are giving little or nothing to society in return.

First we have the case of inherited wealth. I refer not to the small inheritance of the widow who may receive a few thousand dollars to carry her through the remainder of her life. I refer rather to that carry-over of feudal society, the large estates like those of the Astors, the Rockefellers, the Mellons, the Vanderbilts, which pass from generation to generation through inheritance.

Each year more than $2,000,000,000 of such substantial estates are passed from one person to another. The recipient of the estate has done nothing whatever toward the creation of the wealth. It is to him a windfall. He pockets the proceeds and renders less service to society than the much despised hobo. If he lives in leisure and luxury on the income which has been given him, he is thereby subtracting from the annual production of goods—an income to which he has no claim, since he has created no wealth. If he continues to work, using his wealth for the building of an even greater estate, he is bound to create more factories and capital equipment in a country which already has a surplus in these fields. Inheritance is a carry-over which curses our society and allows people who have, by the lottery of birth, drawn what is really an unlucky number to waste their lives while they absorb income to which they have no title. I suggest, then, that inheritance is, in our classification of incomes as divided between earnings, finding, and stealings, a finding. And I see no reason why we should continue to tolerate this finding by permitting the continuance of large inheritances.

In the same classification of findings we may place rents on land. I refer here not to the income of a person who has received a return from real estate through building or other productive activity, but to that income which arises solely from land—land rents. The value of American land was at the last census $150,000,000,000, nearly one third of the American wealth. This land value was not created by its owners. The land rent represents the toll collected by those who hold deeds to it, the location of the land which gives it value, or its natural fertility and qualities inherent in the land, which is a social heritage.

This problem is especially one which faces our great cities. There, in order to erect a building, one must pay as much, or more, for the land as the cost of the building. This payment, viewed from the social standpoint, is not for the service of any individual. It is merely a levy subtracted from the income of society for the benefit of the holder of a piece of paper called a deed. As society progresses land values rise and absorb an ever-increasing share of the product. The holders of the land are collecting income on $150,000,000,000 of value while they are not rendering as landlords one iota of service to our society. If all land rents were tomorrow absorbed by taxes, there would be no less product. The landlord alone would suffer. This is clearly another finding in our classification of incomes as divided between earnings, findings, and stealings.

Perhaps this point should be pressed a little further. As one looks about him with a common-sense attitude, land titles seem like any other titles. Many have been acquired in good faith. They are part of our property system. But viewed in a broader light, they are the result of a mistaken social policy by which the Government permitted city land sites, coal mines, oil fields, in fact the bulk of all our natural resources, to slip into the hands of private owners, who now take a tax from the rest of us out of the production of society. Had the Government elected the wiser course of leasing these lands at an advancing rent, we would today not be faced with many of our pressing problems. The rental income would be a substantial share of Government revenues and we would not have created such a large parasitic class living on the earnings of producers.

Our survey of who receives the income in the United States leads us next to the classification of stealings. Here, unfortunately, information is meager, for stealing on a sufficiently large scale seems well legalized. The petty thief may find a cell awaiting him, but the Samuel Insulls, the Krugers, and the many bankers and industrialists who, in one way or another, have looted our country, have surprising facility in avoiding such a fate. I am not here referring to the personal dishonesty of those business leaders who have robbed the tills of the corporations and trusts which they are administering by high salaries and manipulation. This has been done in many cases. I refer rather to the monopolistic price arrangements by which our corporations in many of our basic industries have deliberately aimed so to restrict output as to compel the consumer to pay a monopolistic price—thus stealing from the consumer's pocketbook as definitely as if the robbery were personally committed. Aluminum is conspicuously a case in point. In that industry, controlled by Andrew Mellon and his associates, price reductions have not kept step with the lowering of costs. The industry holds a virtual monopoly of the world's bauxite ores, upon which production depends. It dominates the aluminum market.

But aluminum is not the only case of robbery by monopolistic corporations. We have in our public utility structure a vast maze of holding companies which defy governmental regulation, erected essentially for the purpose of lifting from the consumer sufficient income to pay ample returns upon inflated stock issues. In fact, as one looks at the business world to discover the degree to which it is actually producing necessary goods at reasonable prices one conclusion seems clear. Business is organized for profit and not for service. It consists of erecting highly specialized corporations for the purpose of getting the maximum return while rendering a minimum in serviceable goods. If, as engineers suggest, our business structure is competent at this moment to produce triple the volume of goods that are flowing from our factories and fails to produce these, we may conclude that the public is, by the failure of the business system, being robbed of two thirds of its industrial income. One outstanding American economist, Thorstein Veblem, has suggested that the business system is one of organized sabotage of the industrialists against the consumers. This view, though ridiculed at the time of its appearance, seems today close to the truth. Certainly we have for 4 years been witnessing the shrinkage of our national income because of the failure of capitalism.

The owners of America in the mad speculation period of the 1920's piled up bond and mortgage debts which now total 237 billions—a sum approximately equal to the present national wealth. On top of this are stock issues and deeds to property on which they hope to command an income. The result is that the total of interest and dividend payments has, according to the conservative Journal of Commerce, during the entire depression continued at levels almost double those of 1925. (Last year the country paid $7,000,000,000 for corporate interest and dividends as against $4,000,000,000 in 1925, at a time when 15,000,000 people were jobless. This year the situation remains almost as bad.)

Looked at in the large, our capitalistic system is one in which those who engage in productive activity secure meager rewards while those who deal in little sheets of paper called stocks, bonds, and mortgages take a heavy toll in findings and stealings from the product. The new deal of Roosevelt seems essentially aimed toward the preservation of these property incomes rather than toward the alteration of this system.

The significance of the situation as regards taxation seems clear. Taxation should today be levied not upon the purchases of the masses of small consumers, as is now being done, but should be used as a method of absorbing the findings and the stealings of those who have to date been our industrial overlords. This may appear to be a policy of confiscation. In a sense it is, but it is confiscation of incomes which never were earned, of titles which never were clear. It is a taking by the people of property which should never have been allowed to enter private hands. Several practical proposals appear for State and Federal taxation.

First. We should have an inheritance tax which, exempting small inheritance, would completely annihilate all the great dynasties which today run America. This tax should be supplemented with appropriate gift taxes to prevent evasion.

Second. We should tackle the land problem and absorb the land values of the absentee holders who today receive such a share of the annual income without rendering service.

Third. We should place high taxes on the excess profits of our monopolistic combines, which have been fostered by the N.R.A. The N.R.A. is in its essence a legalization of monopolistic price fixation by industrialists.

Fourth. We should have highly graduated income taxes which would place the levy primarily upon people whose annual earnings are in excess of $5,000. In this connection a first and fundamental step is to eliminate the $40,000,000,000 of wholly and partly tax-exempt bonds which have in the past been bought by the wealthy as a means of evading existing income-tax payments.

Fifth. We should demand that the devastating burden of sales taxation and other levies upon small incomes should be repealed so that consumption may climb to higher levels and assist business recovery. In this connection it is significant that sales taxes already bring in 20 percent of Federal, State, and local revenues. The percentage may leap to 25 percent this year with the new Federal sales taxes.

These proposals for taxation reform may seem drastic, but taken together they are not enough, for even they do not get at the root of our problem, which is private ownership and exploitation. Were they adopted, and I seriously doubt whether they will be, by the corporation-dominated Democratic Party, they might serve to lengthen the life of a decaying economic system. No recovery, however conceived, can go far until functionless income has disappeared from our social organization. We have suffered too long under an accumulation of ills to find a solution to our problem in terms of taxation reform alone. A day may come in the not-distant future when these very property rights which are today earned or unearned, considered so sacred, will be erased by an enraged populace which is determined that the right of the people of the country to access to land and bread is more sacred than the bulwarking of the capitalist system by paying interest and dividend claims.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT

(By Rev. James Myers, industrial secretary Federal Council the Churches of Christ in America)

Some people have expressed alarm over the rapid assumption of social responsibility on the part of the Federal Government since last March. Many more, no doubt, will be alarmed at some of the proposals for further Government action now being discussed at this conference and in other quarters. These proposals range all the way from a demand for more Federal funds for unemployment relief to programs for the complete Government ownership of industry. It is not my assignment this afternoon to discuss any of these specific proposals as such, but to bring to your attention what I believe we shall all sooner or later come to recognize. My proposition is this: It is the responsibility of government to build whatever social machinery may be necessary, not only for the relief of unemployment but for the development of a political and economic system in which the tragic spectacle of starvation in the midst of plenty will not again occur.

We are, I think, driven to this conclusion of the Government's responsibility, first, because of the practical necessities of the situation; and, secondly, because of the very purposes for which the Government of the United States was originally brought into being.

As an illustration of the practical necessity of Federal Government action, we need only to cite the breakdown of State and local resources for unemployment relief, which forced the Federal Government to step into the picture and supply the funds which have saved millions of human lives.

In the matter of labor standards, it has become equally apparent that only Federal action can be effective. For 25 years we have endeavored to abolish child labor by means of individual State legislation, with but little result. In fact, we developed by that method the wholly immoral situation, which enabled business men to make the most money in States where children could be treated the worst. Under the National Recovery Administration, because of its industry-wide planning and national scope, child labor has been abolished by common consent in many industries, and by a stroke of the President's pen. The Federal child labor amendment should now be ratified, and this reform made permanent.

The same principle of Federal legislation will be a practical necessity in the control of wages and hours and of a hundred other matters of general welfare which time does not permit me to enumerate. Only the Federal Government can extend a uniform jurisdiction over the whole area affected. Only the Federal Government has the wide powers of taxation, the necessary credit and other resources for the integration of the economic and industrial life of the Nation as a whole.

As a matter of fact, in the days of national economic crisis last March it was, as we all know, action by the Federal Government which saved even the banks and entire business life of the Nation from utter chaos. It seems just a bit humorous, under all the circumstances, to hear some business men beginning now to demand the return of the economic life of the Nation to what they call the "individual initiative of private enterprise", which they say has made America a great and prosperous country. The prosperity has not been too apparent during the last few years; and the initiative which saved the day, to the degree to which it has been saved, did not come from private enterprise. Our industrialists and bankers were as bankrupt in ideas on how to bring us out of the depression as many of their concerns were bankrupt in their exchequers. The initiative came from the Federal Government. I see no inherent reason why the Federal Government cannot continue to exercise initiative—an initiative to be directed more and more toward the welfare of all our people. Is it reasonable, my friends, to keep alive our old fear of Government action? The Government, after all, in a democracy is just "all of us"—the political and economic family of the Nation.

Provided that we are careful to avoid the dictatorship of fascism, on the one hand, and the dictatorship of communism, on the other hand; provided that we shall develop forms of industrial democracy as well as of political democracy in this country, I see no reason why increasing Government control should not prove a blessing to the Nation—in fact, the only probable direction from which we may look for a blessing.

It is doubtful how many people in the United States, aside from the interested parties themselves, would really want the country turned back again to the unregulated forces of private enterprise, individual initiative, and rugged individualism which presented us with the cataclysm of 1929 and the unspeakable human suffering of the unemployed in the years which have followed.

Those who object that it is unconstitutional for the Federal Government to concern itself with social and economic objectives, should reexamine the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the very purposes for which the Federal Government was established were, among others, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity" and "to promote the general welfare." Those who object to our Government at this time embarking upon new and untried experiments in order to secure this "general welfare" for our people, seem to forget that social and political pioneering constitutes the very essence of Americanism. Our forefathers had in common one great dominant trait, and that was their spirit of adventure in a new world. Inspired by religious idealism they dared to undertake, under new conditions on this continent, a great untried political and economic experiment dedicated to the welfare of the common man.

My friends, we, too, face a new world today, a world made new by sweeping economic change. If we shall prove ourselves worthy of the spirit of our ancestors, it will be our high privilege to participate in the adventure of a new social order, a cooperative commonwealth of nations. This new order will at last, please God, establish justice among all nations, insure tranquillity for all the world, and promote the general welfare of mankind.

PROMPT ACTION IS IMPERATIVE

By Dr. Edward L. Israel, Baltimore, Md.

There is no doubt at all that the program of the Roosevelt administration, as epitomized in the N.R.A., and the A.A.A., and many other of these new ventures of government, carries out the fond hopes of the liberals who were the severest critics of the Hoover inanition. Let's give credit where it is due. The present administration has had the courage to challenge modern capitalism on some of its most firmly entrenched fronts. It has taken the basic necessary steps to bring about a finer social order.

We can say all these things without admitting for a moment that the N.R.A. is a perfect plan. Many problems are involved in its success. It, of course, remains basically capitalistic even though it is a more altruistic capitalism, but there are many who question whether capitalism can ever be altruistic enough to render social service or even to save itself.

Even as one who believes in ultimate social control and an abolition of the profit system as we now know it, I am not impressed by the radical criticism of the N.R.A. If we are to accomplish revolutionary social changes in an orderly manner under parliamentary government, it will have to be by very gradual steps. The N.R.A. is simply a feeble yet determined first move in the right direction. The left wing group don't seem to want to support it very much, because they are afraid that the N.R.A. is bolstering up a dying capitalism. I should think that they would have perspicacity enough to realize that if they don't play along with the basic principles of N.R.A., they are playing directly into the hands of the fascists.

So much for our spirit of sympathy with the splendid motives of our national administration. It is obvious, however, that something more drastic has to be done to level out the inequalities of wealth that are at the basis of unemployment and all the ills of our economic society. The foremost implement that the Government has for accomplishing this end is a drastic and resolute income tax. This is the only means of spiking the selfish moves of our American exploiters who are sending their money to foreign countries or who are chiseling on the N.R.A. The present income tax is a joke. It puts a crushing burden on the man of moderate means and lets the big fellow wallow in his undue proportion of worldly goods. I take for granted that I don't have to argue the case for the immediate passage of drastic inheritance tax laws. The specific example of those two indolent heiresses of America who recently inherited an aggregate of over $100,000,000 while hundreds of thousands of other young girls in America are wondering where their next meal is coming from—that in itself is sufficient argument for a stiff inheritance tax to convince the most skeptical.

But as for income taxes—I am not going to bore you with a lot of statistics. I am merely going to tell you that even now, after a few years of depression, there are thousands of people in this country whose income runs into such enormous figures that they cannot possibly spend it on themselves and their families. Are we going to allow the whole safety and security of our American life to be endangered by this improper distribution of wealth? Doesn't the very spirit of the N.R.A. require a limitation on the plunder policy of our capitalistic society and a curb on those individuals who grab so much out of the basket of American life that thousands of others don't have anything?

A liberal government is intent on putting these curbs on unbridled exploitation. Its program in this direction is very conservative and is taking a long time to get into action. The one thing that can do it quickly and efficiently is a sharp tax on incomes with at least a 75-percent tax on any income in excess of $150,000 a year. The government is the most effective channel for the redistribution of wealth and the most effective means of accomplishing that is through the powers of taxation. The coming Congress must face this problem with a complete freedom from these lobbies of wealth and with a consecrated and unswerving interest in and devotion to the welfare and safety of the masses of America.

WHAT THE UNEMPLOYED FEEL

(By David Lasser, Executive Secretary New York Workers' Committee on Unemployment)

After 4 years of joblessness, the unemployed have come to feel that a wall exists before them, blocking the resumption of their normal lives as wage earners. Their position and attitude is like that of the soldiers, who after 4 years of warfare, wonders if he was ever a civilian, and will be one again.

The unemployed have lost their skill as workers, and the feeling of the joy of work that is the part of every man. They are bewildered by the quarrels over their fate, made by "eminent authorities" by "economists" and "philanthropists." Why, the unemployed ask, should abstruse theories be invented for putting them back to work? After all, they reason, they are producers; what they produce is needed by others; what they are paid is spent to supply work for others. Why the interminable arguments?

At first bewildered and lost in the vast economic machine, split by racial, national, and sectional differences, the unemployed slowly drift together, feeling a solidarity and comfort in their numbers. As "loyal American citizens", they felt at first that they should not grumble or complain about their fate; they should be patriotic and stand behind the governing officials trying to find a way out of the crisis. They responded with great hope to the N.R.A., but now it is a thing of derision. Slowly, too slowly, the unemployed have realized that the only solution to their problems lie in common action. They have been finally weaned away from individualism and the comfort of promises.

Looking for leaders in their unemployed movements, the unemployed have been wary, suspicious. They do not long for political Utopias, but rather for practical results in their day-to-day struggles for elementary things. They are content to wait until they have a full stomach and a more secure shelter to think of the action necessary in the future. Like the drowning man, they are not interested in the laws of gravitation but rather in how to get out of the water immediately.

The new Civil Works program, rather than stilling their growing unrest, will accentuate it and yet give the unemployed enough security to turn some thought to tomorrow and political action of some kind.

The unemployed yearn for leadership more and more. Who will lead them? The warnings of Germany and Italy indicate that a fire-breathing demagogue, preaching racial and sectional hatreds may rise and with the promise of jobs lead the unemployed on to fascist violence. Oppressed as they are by the weight of years of misery, the unemployed want to hit something or somebody. Recent lynchings show how tense the Nation is and how ready to pour out its accumulated miseries in futile violence.

They will be led, either by leaders of the working class, who represent them, or by an American Hitler, who will use them as fuel for fascist flames. The feelings of the unemployed are fast crystallizing. They know now that they are the disinherited, the pariahs of our industrial society. The opportunities to organize the unemployed as an integral part of the working-class movement were never better; the dangers of neglect of working-class organization of them were never greater. The responsibility lies upon all working-class movements—political, trade unions, fraternal, and even upon the liberal groups who would be horrified at a fascist movement.

HOW THE UNEMPLOYED FEEL

(By Joel Seidman, of Baltimore, representing the People's Unemployment League of Maryland)

The unemployed are today in a state of dissatisfaction—not the passive acquiescence in misfortune that characterized them earlier in the depression but a more aggressive dissatisfaction that may soon break out in political revolt against the failure of the Government to solve their problems.

Let no one underestimate the tremendous resentment of the unemployed against charity in all its forms. The most cordially disliked persons in the country are those connected with the administration of relief. Some of that dislike is now beginning to pass over to those upon whom it should have been visited in the first instance—the business heads who led us into the depression and the political leaders who failed to find a way out.

President Roosevelt's "new deal" aroused the hopes of the unemployed, only to disillusion them anew. The program of civil works is looked upon as just a sugar-coated form of charity, as a stopgap, as an expression of the administration's failure to stimulate business and provide normal employment. The Government has failed to establish even unemployment insurance.

The unemployed are sick of charity. They want jobs and security, and they are fast losing confidence in an economic system that has failed tragically to provide either. During necessary jobless intervals they want unemployment insurance. Their greatest need and their greatest hope today are for leaders who can guide their discontent into productive channels of pressure and protest, to the end that employment and security may be won for all.

NEEDED—A GOVERNMENT MARKETING CORPORATION

(By Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary the People's Lobby)

If the March 15, 1926, price level were in effect, a family which used 2 quarts of milk and 2 loaves of bread a day, and 2 pounds of butter, 2 dozen eggs, 10 pounds of potatoes, 5 pounds of sugar, and 2 pounds of sirloin steak a week, would pay $100.79 more than at the August 15, 1933, price level; and those prices were too high for the unskilled employed.

The 1926 price level means an average increase in the cost of living over present prices of about 30 percent.

Consumers have always paid for farm products enough to afford farmers a fair return on legitimate costs. The farmer has usually gotten about 40 cents of the consumers' dollar. In 1932 consumers paid for meat products $1,656,000,000, and producers received $721,000,000, so the spread was $935,000,000.

A Government marketing corporation empowered to buy farm products, process them, and sell them to the ultimate consumer, should reduce the spread at least one half. Congress should create such a corporation.

THE NEGRO AND UNEMPLOYMENT

By Charles Edward Russell

The situation of the colored worker of this country in respect to unemployment and destitution may be best illuminated by reference to a few statistics.

Here in the city of Washington, Capital of the Nation, the number of persons receiving public relief on October 31, 1933, was 14,188, of whom 10,606 were Negroes. The Negro population of the city is 27 percent of the white. The proportion of Negroes receiving relief is 75 percent. In Cook County, Ill., which means virtually the city of Chicago, the Negro population is 6 percent of the total; the Negroes receiving relief are more than 20 percent of the total. In Philadelphia the Negroes form 11 percent of the total population and 36 percent of the total number receiving relief. In Baltimore the Negro population is 17 percent of the total and 44 percent of the family relief work carried on by private agencies is for Negroes. Last year of 12,000,000 unemployed workers in America, 1,500,000 were Negroes. For a reason I shall revert to later, the disproportion has since much increased.

In the larger industrial centers today, Negroes form 40 to 50 percent of the unemployed. In Birmingham, Ala., they form 75 percent. In St. Louis 8 percent of the Negro workers are unemployed or partly employed—5 percent without any work, 3 percent on part time.

It is a sinister fact and a disquieting fact that upon this submerged 10 percent of our population the measures for national relief, certain measures of relief that have been of undoubted and often great benefit to the generality of workers, have only augumented the misery of the colored. The codes of the N.R.A. have shortened hours for the white workers, sometimes increased their pay, and sometimes diminished unemployment. They have too often worked among the colored population to deprive even those at work of their jobs.

To understand this we must remember that the average pay of colored workers has always been lower, distinctly lower, than that of white workers doing the same class of work. In many instances it has been recognized and even standardized at 50 percent lower. On these terms white employers, particularly in the part of the country where after 70 years the Civil War is still raging, were willing to employ colored persons. When the N.R.A. codes appeared with their minimum wage limits this economic advantage disappeared for the white employers. Confronted with the necessity of raising wages in all the lower grades of employment he instantly and almost universally decided that at the same wage levels he would prefer to employ white labor and dismissed his colored employees even though they might have been years in his service.

This has resulted in a huge increase of unemployment in the southern States, and a corresponding increase in the criminal difficulties. A survey of the situation made under the direction of Mr. John B. Davis, of the Joint Committee on Unemployment, disclosed that this movement to dismiss colored employees and substitute whites was by no means confined to the South nor to industrial employments. It extended also to the North and included there employment as domestic servants. One typical case, an example of thousands, may be cited as an illustration. A negro truck driver had been employed for many years at $5.50 a week. When the code went into effect his wage must be raised to $12.50. He was discharged and a white man put in his place. Where Negroes are still employed in the South, they are often employed at wages that violate the codes. Of this many instances were found, one of them being the case of an employer that hired Negroes at less than code rates and still sat on the board formed to enforce the code—a typical instance of the psychology of the southern employer.

But I do not know that it is fair to say this as if the South were the only offender. In Kansas City, Mo., for instance, 60 percent of the colored domestic workers have been displaced, and in Philadelphia this movement has gone on to a point where displaced colored workers are offering their services at 74 cents a day. In Greensboro, N.C., however, they are working for $1 a week, with room and board, and in many other places in the South for $4 a week and find their own rooms. At Norfolk, Va., women are working for $4 a week, that must pay from it $1.25 a week for street-car or bus fare.

In one southern community the board of trade has been actively at work coercing employers to discharge colored workers and replace them with white. In another the League of Women Voters sent about the city organized bands of Boy Scouts to seek out opportunities for work upon the understanding that only white workers were to be employed.

In Gary, Ind., 5 Negroes have been discharged for every 3 white workers that have suffered the same fate. When there were signs of an industrial improvement and men were being rehired, 5 white men were hired for every 3 Negroes.

In 12 large cities, of 12,616 persons registered as unemployed, 75 percent were colored; of domestic workers, 78 of the unemployed were colored.

Public bodies sometimes do not hesitate to openly avow their purpose to discriminate against the Negro. The Railroad Commission of South Carolina has made a rule that no pullman car shall be operated in the State unless it is in charge of a white man.

The most effective method of getting rid of colored labor has been developed in what may be called the Mississippi plan, and consisted of shooting colored workers on the railroads or beating them with clubs until disabled. On one division of one railroad in Mississippi in a few months 7 colored workers were shot to death while performing their duties, and more than 20 were disabled.

The conclusion from all this is obvious, sinister, and certain. We have created here in America a helot class. When depression comes we grind still lower those that in times of what is called "prosperity" bore always a load of our contempt, injustice, and oppression. We have implacably pursued with our vengeance those of our fellow creatures that have been guilty of the crime of a dark complexion. They being the helpless and defenseless perpetrators of this offense against our unwritten laws of tinting, when a time comes in which we must pay to these pariahs the wages we must pay to others, we prefer to have them as wretched dependents upon charity than to allow them a chance to earn their own living upon the same economic basis as white persons earn theirs. It is an oppression perfectly safe. No one will effectively champion the cause of the pariah and do him right. But even those of us that believe in the penalty for pigment must profitably remember that, if all tales are true, there is in the universe another system of justice than ours, and the requital of that Thomas Jefferson foresaw for the unutterable sin of slavery may not overlook the sin of racial hatred and racial persecution.

LIMITATION OF THE HOURS OF LABOR

(By Charles W. Erwin, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America)

The 130,000 workers joined together in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America favor the limitation of the hours of labor primarily because it is the first attempt to meet the evils of unemployment and low wages while employed.

Bitter experience has taught us that the evils of unemployment and low wages can be efficiently attacked only through governmental action. Those employers who have enough social vision to perceive that the maintaining of decent standards of wages and conditions in their factories makes for the good of the entire community as well as for themselves are not sufficiently large in number to be able to bring about conditions in industry which will at least approximate those that should rule in any truly civilized nation.

No matter how strong the urge of these employers might be to achieve a higher industrial civilization, they are subject to the competition of other employers in their particular industry whose only urge is immediate profits, irrespective of what damage to the social body might be done through the maintenance of a low standard of wages. Experience has proven that it is useless merely to appeal to the sense of justice of those who are in control of the means of production and distribution. It is vitally important therefore to throw the whole power of government behind both those employed in industry and the minority of employers who are at least intelligently selfish enough to know that they cannot continue to prosper unless a higher standard than now exists is maintained by the workers as a whole.

We have heard much talk about the 40-hour work week, and the blanket code, under which industry was supposed to run until the various particular codes were adopted, called for this basis as a work week. It does not require any guessing to know that a 40-hour week in the vast majority of cases will not put back a sufficient number of people on their jobs to bring about the increased purchasing power that President Roosevelt has been striving for through the N.R.A.

The general president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, Sidney Hillman, who is also a member of the Labor Advisory Board of the N.R.A., in his address at the clothing code hearing, submitted figures which proved beyond hope of successful contradiction, that the number of workers who would be put back on the basis of the 40-hour work week would be negligible. Knowing the impossibility, however, of securing the 30-hour week, a compromise had to be made which called for a 36-hour week. Events since have proved that a 30-hour basis will doubtless have to be adopted if the standard of the clothing workers is to be returned to where it was before the deflation of 1920.

Together with the limitations of the hours of labor must go increases in wages if the entire N.R.A. program is not to result merely in the spreading of work at poverty wages in place of the giving of work to all in the industries at wages which will enable them to maintain within the present economic system at least a standard of life which approximates what our social experts are pleased to call "decent standards."

TAXATION OF INCOMES AND CORPORATION SURPLUSES

(By Dr. John H. Gray, former president the American Economic Association)

We are truly in a new era—the power era with its automatic machinery. We have the wealth, we have the raw material, we have the equipment and workers, and we have the technical skill to produce and distribute an abundance of material things for all our population. Furthermore, we have the cash and the credit machinery to start the industrial machine. All we lack is sense.

There is but one difficulty—that is that the wealth is too much concentrated in both ownership and control, while the cash and credit is much more concentrated. The banks in the Reserve System, if there were a demand for it and they were not afraid, could expand bank credit safely by $8,500,000,000 to $10,000,000,000, if they saw a chance to make a profit by it. But there is no chance to make a profit in the present deadlock and lack of confidence.

How long are we going to allow the fetish of profits and property rights to prevent feeding the hungry and putting the unemployed to work? You cannot start the industrial machine by an increase of commodity prices, by creating more debts, or even by destroying the disequilibrium between the prices of factory-made goods and farm products, nor by flooding the country with paper money, nor by devaluing the gold dollar.

At least either or both of the last-named remedies, if they did start the industrial machine, would surely result in a wild speculation in both securities and commodities, in an increase of land values, and an increase of debts that would soon bring us to a collapse more disastrous than the one we are now in. Nor is the construction of Federal public works by money from bond issues likely to go fast enough, or far enough, to have significant effect before the national credit is shaken to be of much benefit.

The construction of public works, State or Federal, or both, is too small and too slow to meet the present emergency. For notwithstanding all the Federal appropriations and all the ballyhoo, the total amount of public works is much smaller than 2 years ago, and we are in the fifth year of distress. Some increase in Federal public works has been more than offset by a virtual cessation of State and local public works, except such as are now carried on by Federal funds.

F. M. Woodlock, in the Wall Street Journal of November 28, 1933, says there can be no revival of business until the business men who now control the concentrated liquid capital see their way to make a profit by putting it into circulation. I agree with him that there can be no revival until this liquid capital is put into circulation, but there is no way to put it into circulation until it is taken away from the men who now control it and turned directly into purchasing power in the hands of the masses of the people. Of course, if it were so used, it would ultimately redound to the benefit of those who now own or control it, for it is not earning them anything worth mentioning. Witness the fact that all the national banks together last year operated at a total deficit of $140,000,000. The current year is much worse for them than the last.

There can be no social justice, no prosperity, no prevention of starvation until we are producing more than we are at present, nor until our foreign trade is in a measure restored. Those now living can never hope to see it restored to the plane of 5 years ago.

The latest publication of the League of Nations at hand (Survey of Economic Conditions, 1932–33) states that foreign trade of all European countries the last quarter of 1932 was less than 40 percent of that of 1929, and that the foreign trade of the rest of the world fell off more than 70 percent, and that wages and salaries in the United States fell from $53,300,000,000 in 1929 to $28,200,000,000 in 1932, a loss of $25,100,000,000, or 53.1 percent. Under any decent arrangement and distribution of property, most of this $25,100,000,000 would have been spent for consumable goods, not for investment.

With purchasing power so curtailed by unemployment, what is the use of talking about business revival or prosperity or the balancing of the Budget? They are literally impossible.

By the same authority "there are now 41,500,000 workers covered by unemployment insurance"; but with so large a part of the total population actually unemployed, all these systems have departed from an actuarial basis. They are all living to a very serious degree off accumulated saving and for the most part by placing additional debts on a world already in debt to a much greater degree than can ever be paid, even if the people were at work, much less when so large a portion of the working people are idle and living on doles.

What is the sense in talking about raising prices of commodities, or worse, of destroying the disequilibrium between different classes of commodities, when so large a part of the population have no purchasing power whatever at any price, and when all the purchasing power, particularly in the United States, is in the hands of so few people who do not need to purchase for consumption, and because of this or their fear are purchasing much less than usual, and are howling about overproduction and taxes. It is, in fact, overproduction only in a sense that purchasing power has been withdrawn from the great masses who need and want the goods to such a degree that the goods cannot be sold at a profit for those who have the legal title to them.

It is not overproduction but lack of purchasing power in the hands of the masses from which we suffer. It is well known that the great surplus that cannot be sold at a profit today consists primarily of raw materials and foodstuffs.

Do we have overproduction of foodstuffs in any rational sense with tens of millions of people starving, here and abroad? The publication of the League of Nations referred to estimates the world production of foodstuffs in 1932 at about the same as 1929 (there has been a great decline in the amount of manufactured goods); yet, if the trend of increase of production from 1925 to 1929 had continued to 1932, the production of 1929 would have been much greater than it was, yet would have fallen far short of the needs of the world as shown by the growth of population.

The report says that, with the exception of some tropical products, there is not enough of food products. The alleged surpluses after 1920–21 would have rapidly disappeared had purchasing power been properly distributed. If the trend of increase of production from 1860 to 1913 had continued until 1932, the production would have been twice what it was in 1932.

We are not suffering from overproduction, but from an insane, irrational, and impossible concentration of wealth which deprives a very large part of the population of any purchasing power whatever. This has stopped the industrial machine, thrown millions out of employment, and made paupers of them.

The situation has been greatly intensified by insane nationalism. In 16 months, beginning in September 1931, 23 nations had general increases in tariffs, 50 countries increased their tariffs, 52 countries imposed import quotas, license systems, prohibitions, etc., and 12 established import monopolies, largely on grains.

France, Great Britain, Australia, Germany, Italy, New Zealand, and Czechoslovakia have greatly reduced their debt charges by refunding at lower interest rates. On the other hand, we are adding daily to our debt charges by piling up additional debts in the attempt to start industry on the basis of profits.

Our discredited business "leaders" are trying to hold the social revolt until the depression cures itself, which means until the debts are liquidated by bankruptcies as has been the case in earlier depressions. They do not realize that the circumstances which made such a procedure possible in the past have entirely disappeared, and that if such a procedure were prolonged long enough, it would mean literally universal bankruptcy and total collapse. Prices will not rise till purchasing power is put into the hands of the masses. That purchasing power is now in the control of a handful of men in New York who are bound by traditions of profit that will not let it go into the hands of the people voluntarily.

Furthermore, in earlier depressions circumstances were such that when debts were paid, the debt burden was lightened. But with the fix we are in today, the more debt is paid the heavier the debt burden becomes.

This is due to the effect of falling prices. Irving Fisher says that by March 1933, 20 percent of debt existing in 1929 had been liquidated (largely by bankruptcies and foreclosures, it is true), but that due to the fall of prices the debt remaining had increased the total debt burden by 40 percent (Economea, Oct. 1933, vol. 1, p. 346).

President Roosevelt's efforts are to be highly recommended. He, at least, is doing something to feed the people and to put some of them to work on useless and ill-planned work for the most part, but they have little or no effect in starting permanently the industrial machine by putting purchasing power in the hands of the masses. His efforts are chiefly valuable because they compel the American people to think about social and economic matters for the first time in generations. This is fundamentally necessary before any administration can make serious headway, for no administration can go much faster, or much farther than public opinion will support it. Therefore, the President's educational program is probably worth much more than it is costing.

The so-called "business leaders" have been thoroughly discredited, but not the system which made them and led us to disaster. That system can never be made to work again, even to the satisfaction of those who were dominant till the collapse of 1929.

This crisis calls for purchasing power in the hands of the people—not for the artificial raising of prices, however low the prices or however great the disequilibrium between prices of different groups of commodities. But two possible and available sources of funds are in sight—the concentrated liquid capital now centered in New York, or even increasing Government loans. The loans if possible would put an intolerable burden of debt on the consumers of the future. If the loans could be floated in sufficient quantity and the proceeds distributed speedily enough in sufficient quantity in cash to the unemployed or by Government expenditures on a sufficient scale, it would increase the purchasing power, increase prices, start the industrial machine and enable us to collect taxes enough to balance the Budget.

But God forbid that we should have a revival of business unless we take measures to prevent such a collapse as we are now in.

If present attempts could be successful, the money would have to come from the liquid capital now in New York, but the present owners of it would have a claim on future industry for its repayment. But the Government credit has limitations, and may easily reach a breaking point, if pressed much further. The attempt this week at refunding illustrates that the breaking point is not far off. But present methods are altogether too slow and indirect. Apart from the slow and cumbersome public-works program, the Government has already poured billions of dollars into private companies, in the attempt to start business, which can be started, as said so often, only by purchasing power in the hands of the public. But the advances made to banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions are virtually lodged in the banks and have had no appreciable effect on business or in increasing purchasing power for consumable commodities. That advanced to mortgage companies and home owners has largely gone the same way by more indirect routes, for it has largely been used to pay debts and has then been hoarded or put into the banks by the mortgagees.

We should have been out of this mess years ago if immediately after the collapse the cash surplus existing in 1929 in 50 percent of the largest corporations had been taken by taxation and distributed in cash weekly payments to the unemployed families. Most of it would have gone immediately to the stores for consumable goods. The stores, which all have short stocks, would have appealed at once to the manufacturers who have virtually no stocks—a slight accumulation was made last summer on the speculation of currency inflation—the manufacturers would have hired men and bought materials and started industry.

Taxation is the only available means for a redistribution of wealth. With all the extreme attempts of the Supreme Court to protect property rights by strained construction of the Constitution, fortunately the Court has left the gate wider open in regard to taxation than in any other part of the Constitution.

The only restrictive reference in the language of the Constitution on taxation is that relating to apportionment of direct taxes. This is now a dead letter, and Congress is practically unrestricted as to amount or distribution of taxation. (It may be remarked incidentally that all the States are tied hand and foot by constitutional limitations; hence the almost universal State bankruptcy.) No nation can exist permanently with as many excessively rich men as we now have, or with as large individual fortunes as at present. These fortunes must now be dissipated by more progressive taxation, income and inheritance taxes than have yet been proposed. It may be inexpedient to set a definite limit to the amount of money one may acquire, but to save civilization it is now necessary to limit by law the amount he is permitted to bequeath by will, and to take by progressive taxation all above a fixed maximum for public purposes.

Huey Long's particular figures on this subject are open to doubt, but the principle is sound. The Puritan doctrine of thrift and saving has no application in the age of power and plenty. That is particularly true of our present condition of unequal distribution, and large fortunes. Roger Babson said in a public address November 29, 1933, that 2 percent of the population furnishes the bulk of capital for new enterprises, during the dominance of the profit motive. The whole emphasis was placed on loaning and investment. The result was an overinvestment which destroyed profits, and a profitless prosperity, overproduction, collapse, unemployment, disaster, bread lines, and pauperism. This great inequality of wealth with an undue proportion of the annual product going to a few people gave them incomes that they could not spend by the wildest extravagance and luxury. The system lasted only so long as vast foreign territory, peoples, and materials could be profitably exploited. That has all but disappeared. Other nations are resolved to develop their own resources.

The insane nationalism following the war, with its self-determination and national self-sufficiency, has made foreign investments unsafe for years to come. Under these circumstances, we find ourselves greatly overinvested for any market, at home or abroad, at profitable prices. Foreign markets, as already indicated, have almost disappeared. They have disappeared never to return on the present scale during our lifetime.

During the last three Presidential administrations all the emphasis was thrown on profits and investments and forcing foreign markets. (See A. W. Mellon's book on taxation.) With the foreign market almost gone for both foreign goods and investment, we are not only overinvested for the domestic market in depression times, but if every American could be put to work at productive labor, a thing utterly impossible with advancing technology and its consequent unemployment, the overinvestment, with its lack of profits and unemployment, must remain for years to come.

Stuart Chase, in the December 1933 Graphic Survey, says that by the statement of the textile manufacturers themselves, their equipment is double that needed, and cites the United States Commissioner of Labor as saying in 1927 boom times that 19.5 percent of the capacity could meet the demand.

We do not need at present investment, nor saving, but purchasing power in the hands of the public to carry off at a profit—so long as the profit system remains—the goods that our present equipment can produce. The only source of that purchasing power is the large cash surplus of the large corporations, now fast being paid out rapidly in dividends mostly to well-to-do and rich people. These people, under the present uncertainty and fear, lodge the money in the banks or hoard it.

One corporation is now paying unearned dividends at the rate of $120,000,000 a year.

What we need now is a direct levy on the fast disappearing cash surpluses of large corporations. If that should prove insufficient to relieve the situation, and start industry, then a general direct levy. We need not use the phrase "a capital levy", for that phrase has come to make an insane emotional reaction similar to that evoked by the words "socialism", "communism", and even "red" and "anarchy." The ignorant populace do not know that such levies have been the main source of public income in the United States from the very beginning, for the general property tax on which the States and the localities have always mainly depended is a capital levy and nothing else. The trouble with it has been the graft and evasion and inadequate exemptions, not in the theory of it. Under present circumstances these ought to be liberal exemptions.

A national direct levy at any time with total exemptions of say $100,000 or more could easily be collected. It could be all the more easily collected, with the present large cash surpluses, for it must never be forgotten that these surpluses were accumulated by speculative means, largely with other people's money—bank deposits. They have been used for speculative purposes. They not only made and prolonged the depression abroad but furnished a large part of the call loans for the orgy of speculation, on the New York Stock Exchange from 1927 to 1929, when this money drove the average rate of interest on call loans for a year to 12 percent and often put the rate up to 20 percent.

These speculators made it impossible for business men in Europe to obtain loans at any tolerable rate and were the immediate means of throwing the whole world off the gold standard. There was more than $4,500,000,000 of nonbank money, popularly "bootleg" money, on call in New York at the crash. This money so far as not paid out in unearned dividends is today the greatest menace to world prosperity, for it is in control of a handful of profit-seeking men whose god is profit, and it is lying idle. Only a small part of it can be put to work in bank acceptances, and Government short-time securities, and call loans. Most of these have brought for a long time past much less than 1 percent. That amount of cash cannot be there without leading to dangerous and injurious speculation and manipulation of the markets.

To ease the situation, we must not only redistribute existing wealth, but we must provide that a much larger portion of the annual product goes into the hands of people who will not invest it directly or indirectly but who will spend it for services or consumable commodities, and thus make a market for the goods turned out by our great equipment. By far the largest portion of Government expenditure goes either for services or for construction for nonproducing purposes.

If capitalism based on profit seeking is to endure, property as at present held must be redistributed by Government action. That is taxation. Industry must be so reorganized as to permit a much larger proportion of the annual product to go to wages. Wage earners must be given such security for old age and dependents as will permit them to spend on consumption more, and a larger proportion, of their earnings than heretofore, and not to save for investment, directly or indirectly. If their money goes into the banks for saving, it goes, necessarily, into investment indirectly.

Private fortunes must be held in check during the lives of their owners by more progressive income taxes to a degree to discourage investment, and at the death of their holders must be dissipated by inheritance laws and taxes.

Governments must collect much more in taxes than heretofore and spend the money in services and in construction that will not turn out goods to compete with private industry. The way, with our present equipment and technological advance, is now open for virtually unlimited cultural advance, because of our practically unlimited productive power. There is no limit to opportunities in this field, except our ability to produce goods. The amounts that may be spent on scientific research, education, and art, and a host of other things that will add joy and beauty to life, have no other limit than the ability to produce goods. All we need to do is to organize our production and distribution and to take by taxation all above the amount necessary to keep up the capital investment. With a high degree of inequality of fortune—infinitely less than we have today—the richer people who have for generations had more than they could possibly spend and who can no longer find profitable investment for what they save will in the future provide much more savings and investment than can be wisely or profitably employed.

The chief task of the members of this committee, and of all intelligent citizens now, is to see that funds available for purchasing power be taken by taxation as indicated above and placed in the hands of people that need the goods. Prices will then rise, taxes can be collected when people are producing and budgets can be balanced.

Profits will reappear only when production begins.

REDUCTION OF PRINCIPAL OF LONG-TERM DEBTS

(By Leon Henderson, Department of Remedial Loans, Russell Sage Foundation)

The Nation's internal debt, short-and-long term, at the end of 1932 was estimated at $246,000,000,000. The debt service was variously estimated to equal in 1932 from 20 percent to as high as 50 percent of the national income. Contrary to the general impression, only a small proportion of the debt pieces had been written off in the last 4 years, and the sum total of debt in force was tending to hold static because of State, local, and Federal borrowing. What is not known is how heavily the debt burden falls upon wage earners.

Liquidation and debt adjustment have proceeded along individualistic lines, with consequent disorganization and unequal pressure on different classes of debtors. The necessity for orderly processes of writing down dead debts seems self-evident, with the further necessity for nationally planned liquidation. Several States have attempted to deal piecemeal with the debt burden, but in every case the State legislation has been declared unconstitutional, as violating the guaranties of property rights.

The Canadian method of dealing with mortgage debt through provincial debt adjustment acts is giving a high measure of satisfaction and will probably be extended to other debt burden.

National legislation probably to create debt commissioners with power to settle differences is needed for sane handling of dead mortgage debt, whose dead weight rests heavily on purchasing power.

Legislation is needed also to amend the Federal Bankruptcy Act so that wage-earner debtors may make composition with creditors, based upon reduced earning capacity, with debt payments distributed over a long period. It is absurd to think of balancing consumption with production without such adjustment, or to depend upon local, State, or individual mechanisms to bring orderly results.

REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES ON LONG-TERM DEBTS

By Lawrence Dennis, author of Is Capitalism Doomed?

The long-term debt of the United States grew from $36,000,000,000, or $387 per capita, in 1913 to $134,000,000,000, or $1,072 per capita, in 1932. The interest charges were $2,000,000,000, or 6 percent of total national income in 1913, and $8,000,000,000, or 20 percent of the total national income in 1932. Since 1929 the national income has been reduced by more than a half, while the debt charges have increased somewhat. In addition to these figures covering long-term debts, there is outstanding some $103,000,000,000 of short-term debt, a large part of which is really long-term debt, because of perpetual renewals and because the interest paid on such nominally short-term debt involves in large part a transfer of income from a debtor to a creditor class.

In the short-range view of the debt problem the depression is temporary; hence the thing to do about debts is to avert the calamities of foreclosures, bankruptcies, and defaults until the depression is over. This can be done by having the Government declare moratoriums or lend the debtors money to meet their maturing obligations. In the long range view of the debt problem, interest charges are regarded as contributory factors which must be eliminated or reduced, both in order to end the depression and to prevent its return.

The chief trouble with a large national bill for interest is that the recipients of interest do not spend the money as fast as the interest payers would spend it if they did not have to pay interest. The interest problem is mainly one of distribution of income.

The interest theory of old-fashioned liberals and orthodox economists is that during a depression interest rates should be lowered in order to stimulate investment and to reduce production costs. Cheap money will tempt capitalists to invest. Cheap money will mean cheaper goods; cheaper goods will mean larger sales. More investment and larger sales will mean more employment and better business. This theory was fairly true to the realities of the nineteenth century when there were always abundant investment opportunities to tempt capitalists whenever money and goods got cheap enough. There were always new markets for consumers goods when such goods became cheap enough. Today there are neither new investment opportunities nor new markets. There is no more migration and tariffs nullify price reductions.

There is but one good reason for a reduction of interest today, and that is to effect a better distribution of income. Money for public spending should be obtained without incurring interest charges, for any increase in interest charges will only aggravate present evils. Moreover, any economy in interest charges on money used to build houses for the poor can be fully monopolized by the landlord class. The fundamental consideration, however, is this: If the Government borrows from true investors who buy Government bonds out of savings, it will have today to pay well over 4 percent for any considerable amounts of money. This rate is obviously too high. Therefore, if the Government has to use the printing press in connection with its borrowing, the Government will better rely exclusively on the printing press, and not complicate its borrowing with the printing press. The Government is using the printing press when it forces the banks to buy Government bonds.

A reduction in our long-term debt burden can most easily be effected by Government conversion of railroad and farm and public-utility debt into Government bonds and by a paying off of the short-term debt of the State with paper money. These operations will involve nationalization of the railroads and public utilities and the subsidizing of agriculture. A condition precedent to such Government aid to agriculture should be appropriate measures to discourage, if not prevent, future borrowing by farmers.

The basic idea in any sound treatment of the debt problem must be that interest charges have to be reduced with a view to securing a better distribution of money income. Lowering interest rates to encourage further uses of consumer credit or borrowing by impecunious cities, States, or farmers is sheer madness. Such uses of credit are absolutely indefensible because of the problems created by the interest charges.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calender, under rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS WITH DEFAULTING FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

The bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States was announced as first in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I desire to perfect the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator from Utah desire to interrupt?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I inquire, if I may, under what rule are we now proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Under rule VIII.

Mr. KING. Does that permit of debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It permits of 5 minutes' debate.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from California desire to take up his bill—a measure that is so important—under a rule which permits only 5 minutes debate?

Mr. JOHNSON. I assumed that there was no objection to the bill. I do not see any reason why we cannot consider it.

Mr. KING. I am not objecting to that being done.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default in its obligations to the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire, Mr. President, to perfect the language of the bill. On the first page, in line 5, I desire to strike out five words, namely, the words "loan money to, or to."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer that as an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. The next amendment I propose is after the word "bonds", in line 6, to insert the word "securities."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. After the word "government", in line 7, I move to insert the following words:

issued after the passage of this act, or to make any loan to such foreign government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that amendment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere with the passage of the bill but I desire to submit a few observations, and that is the reason I made inquiry as to the rule under which we are proceeding. I may have to avail myself of the opportunity of speaking 5 minutes on each amendment in order to conclude what I desire to say.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to any mode of procedure that may be desired, provided we go on and dispose of the measure.

Mr. KING. I will not interfere with the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object to the amendment last offered by the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. I desire to use the amendment as a vehicle to submit a few observations upon a subject which is not now before us but which is of very great importance, namely, bimetallism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the political and economic life of the people questions are presented and issues raised which demand solution. If they are correctly determined, benefits arise to the people, but if not properly solved they reappear and emphasize the oft-expressed thought that no question is settled until it is settled right.

A great wrong was committed when silver was demonetized and gold monometallism established as the monetary system in many parts of the world. But the silver question is not dead; it stands as a challenging figure in the political and economic path of all nations. Those nations which have demonetized silver are learning that the gold standard is an unsubstantial foundation upon which to rest their monetary system.

The devotees of the gold standard are discovering that gold, which should be only a symbol, has become a tyrant—a cruel and ruthless master. People everywhere are beginning to inquire why silver was robbed of its monetary status and gold enthroned as the supreme monetary power. The gold standard as the sole measure and standard of value is being challenged, and demands are heard in every quarter that silver be rehabilitated and accorded its true status.

Professor Cassel, an outstanding political economist, has declared that "the relentless struggle for gold has brought a fall in prices which has resulted in a crisis producing general depression, heavy losses, economic difficulties, and industrial unemployment", all of which have assumed disquieting proportions.

Many statesmen and economists believe that the world depression is, in part, if not largely, due to the demonetization of silver and the attempt to rest the credits and currencies and business activities of nations upon the narrow base of gold. The inadequacy of gold to meet the demands of trade and commerce and the needs of the people in their industrial and economic life is recognized by many of the leaders of the political and economic life of the world.

Sir Henry Strakosch declares that the deficiencies of monetary gold are well over 100 percent and this has resulted in a sharp fall in commodity prices.

Sir George Paish has stated that the financial situation is one of unprecedented difficulty and the world, particularly since 1914, "has lived upon credit and is indebted, both nationally and internationally, for fabulous sums of money."

The indebtedness of the world is so stupendous as to compel the thought that bankruptcy is inevitable. Published statements by banking institutions and economists indicate that the indebtedness of the United States—National, State, corporate, and individual—exceeds $200,000,000,000 and the obligations of other nations indicate an almost hopeless condition of indebtedness.

Sir Joshua Stamp states that the financial depression is largely due to the instability of money values and to the relative insufficiency of the world's stock of gold and its converse, the weakness of commodity markets.

Even Mr. Keynes, the great English monometallist, declares that gold as the sole standard of purchasing power "is almost a parvenu", by which he means that for thousands of years gold and silver were the standards of value and purchasing power at an accepted ratio of value, and he is compelled to admit that except during brief intervals gold has been "too scarce to serve the needs of the world's principal medium of currency."

There is no validity in the contention that gold is not subject to fluctuation. The fact is that measured by commodities, by the things which it purchased, its variations, and, indeed, gyrations, indicated that it was a most unstable commodity and an unsatisfactory measuring rod. It fluctuates, when measured by labor and commodities; and measured by any standard of value or by commodities, it possesses less merit or value than silver would have possessed had it not been demonetized. Value simply means value in exchange, and it arises out of relations which exist between things. Money, intrinsically, has no value. Purchasing power is a value in economics.

The level of prices of commodities is determined by the number of units of purchasing power; hence, if the number of units are reduced, each remaining unit possesses greater value, expressed in commodity prices, and the prices of commodities, measured by the monetary unit, fall. Value, like utility, it has been said, possesses no intrinsic value but expresses in exchange nothing but ratio.

To speak of the value of an ounce of gold is as absurd as to speak of the ratio of a given number. There must be another number in order to make a ratio. Therefore, value simply means value in exchange. Human estimation placed on desirable objects whose quality is limited determines value.

For thousands of years gold and silver walked side by side carrying the trade and commerce of the world. Mother earth has for thousands of years yielded these two precious metals, the ratio of production being substantially 14 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold.

Sir Archibald Allison, in his History of Europe, states that Great Britain, largely at the instance of creditors and bankers, denied silver access to the mints and made gold the sole standard and measure of value; and he declares that the capital which had been acquired during the Napoleonic Wars, and the interest of the money classes, were so powerful "that Parliament became affected by the desires of its possessors." This resulted in the demonetization of silver, which, within a few years added 50 percent to the value of money and 50-percent weight of debt and taxes. Small land proprietors were ruined and distress was universal. "The number of landowners, within a period of 7 years was reduced from more than 160,000 individuals to less than 30,000 and a large population became the objects of support by organized charity."

The inadequacy of the gold standard to meet the monetary demands of the world must be apparent to every thinking person. Great Britain, which has boasted of her financial strength and power, and for a century has been the champion of gold monometallism, has been compelled to abandon the gold standard, and in so doing dragged other nations from their insecure gold pedestal.

Sir Henry Deterding, a world financial figure, has confessed that the destruction of silver values will defeat trade revival, and that so long as gold and silver were in cooperation "things went well, but that governments, governed by theorists and sheltering themselves behind so-called "money experts", adopted gold as their sole standard of value and have ousted silver by paper. Whether paper is represented by bankers' bills or by bank notes, the only reason for its value is credit, and credit is the same as every other commodity or faculty in that the more there is of it the less valuable it becomes."

It is obvious that of all acceptable systems of currency that system is assuredly the worst which gives a standard, steadily, continuously, and definitely appreciating and which by that very fact throws the burden upon every man of enterprise, upon every man who desires to promote the agricultural or the industrial resources of the country, and benefits no human being whatever.

The occidental nations in destroying silver are developing an oriental competition in the fields of industry, which menaces business and industrial revival and the return of prosperity. It has been said that there is an element of justice in the cruel and irrational policy of demonetizing silver adopted by occidental nations and in the increasing industrial development of China and Japan and India. By demonetizing silver, China and India were robbed of monetary values to the extent of billions of dollars. Their stored wealth, consisting of billions of ounces of silver, was reduced in value, measured by gold, from $1.29 or more an ounce to the low mark of 24 cents an ounce. But, as indicated, this policy has resulted in depriving the occidental nations of markets of great value, and has changed oriental nations into aggressive and successful competitors in the markets of the world. It is imperative that a change in the monetary policies of this and other nations should promptly be inaugurated, if unrest, and indeed, economic and political disturbances are to be arrested and the world lifted from the valley of depression.

Recent investigations by experts and committees in this and other countries have led to the conclusion that commodity prices must be increased if this destructive period of depression shall come to an end. Even the most ardent gold monometallists admit that there must be an increase in commodity prices. Important reports submitted by the League of Nations and by the McMillan Committee of Great Britain, demonstrate that if nations and individuals are to be rescued from bankruptcy, there must be a material increase in prices, particularly in the fields of agriculture and labor. It is impossible for the people of the United States, as well as other nations, to meet their obligations, if material increases in commodity values do not occur.

That the remonetization of silver would increase commodity prices is conceded by all. In the great contest of 1896 the goldites opposed bimetallism largely upon the ground that it would cheapen money and therefore increase prices. They contended that gold was the only "honest money" notwithstanding the fact that under its reign its value, measured by the products of human toil, had greatly increased and want and ruin had come to hundreds of millions of human beings. It was conceded by the gold-standard followers then, as it is conceded now, that for centuries bimetallism had been the monetary policy of most countries of the world, and though there were variations in the ratio and production of gold and silver, they had marched side by side with but slight variation in their value with reference to each other and the purchasing price of each.

The fathers of this Republic not only understood the science of government, but they were students of monetary and economic problems, and knew the relation of money to the political, economic, and industrial life of the people. In the Constitution which they prepared, gold and silver were recognized as the base of our monetary system; and in the first measure enacted they declared for bimetallism, and provided that 371¼ grains of pure silver should be the dollar and unit of value, and that 24¾ grains of pure gold should be of equal value.

That the demonetization of silver in this and in other countries was a great wrong and an injury of the most serious character, it seems to me should be evident to all students of governmental and economic affairs. With the defeat of Mr. Bryan, the gold monometallists believed that the silver question was forever laid at rest. The failure of the gold standard to meet the needs of the world and the tragic economic and industrial conditions confronting this and other countries have compelled a reexamination of the sufficiency of the gold standard and the financial policies which have been pursued under it; and the result has been that the people, sitting as a high court of justice, have decreed that the gold standard has failed to meet the promises made in its behalf, and that silver must be restored to its rightful place as a coequal with gold.

It is true that there is not complete unanimity in the plan to be pursued in restoring silver to the position of primary money, but there is a growing determination that some measure be adopted that will result in the rehabilitation of silver.

In 1930, in various parts of the United States, organizations were effected for the purpose of awakening the American people to the importance of restoring silver to its rightful place. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and myself offered resolutions in the Senate challenging attention to the continued decline in commodity prices and to the importance of obtaining for silver a suitable place in the monetary systems of the world, in order to avert the disastrous consequences that would follow a further decline in the price of silver.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations made a comprehensive study of the effect upon commodity prices by reason of the demonetization of silver; and later a committee in the House of Representatives devoted considerable time to a study of the silver question, and the effect upon the economic and industrial conditions of this and other countries by reason of legislation and policies which had resulted in depriving silver of its status as primary money. Since then there has been an increased interest in this and other countries in the so-called "silver question", and organizations have been formed in this and other countries to promote the rehabilitation of silver.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Utah, acquainted and qualified as I know him to be on this subject, at this point explain in what way he concludes that silver was demonetized; and at the time to which he refers what was the particular thing which, in his judgment, served that purpose and accomplished that object?

Mr. KING. I cannot, in the limited time at my disposal, adequately deal with the matter suggested by my eminent friend from Illinois. I can only submit a few observations hoping that they may have some bearing upon the matter under discussion and meet in a small way his inquiry.

Until 1816 gold and silver were recognized as primary moneys in substantially all countries of the world. Bimetallism was a part of the monetary systems of most nations. As is well known, among primitive peoples commodities were exchanged, and barter was the universal rule; but as civilization advanced and international relations increased, it was found imperative that there should be a medium of exchange—a measuring rod—a plan under which commercial transactions might be facilitated and balances of trade which resulted from such transactions settled. It was discovered that gold and silver were better suited for monetary purposes than any other metals, and it was also discovered that there was a natural ratio between these two metals. When 1 ounce of gold was taken from mother earth there were between 14 and 16 ounces of silver mined. It was recognized that the production of the two metals went hand in hand at a ratio of 14 or 16 to 1. By custom and by regulations and laws, gold and silver were made the moneys of most countries. Credits were extended, based upon agreements to pay in gold or silver, or both. Taxes imposed upon the people for the maintenance of governments were met by the payment of gold or silver, or both.

In the days of Napoleon gold and silver were universally recognized as the moneys of civilized nations, and constituted the base upon which currencies and credits were rested. Bonds and obligations of governments were payable in these metals. England and France, and other European countries, coined both gold and silver at a ratio of 15 or 15½ to 1. When they issued securities, those who purchased the same understood that they were to be paid in gold or silver, or both. Bankers and traders, as well as the people, realized that the quantity or amount of money available greatly influenced trade and commerce. When gold and silver were abundant, it was discovered that wages were higher and commodity prices were enhanced; and, conversely, when there was a limited amount of gold and silver in circulation, prices fell and labor was poorly paid. The holders of securities were not indifferent to this fact, and greedy and selfish persons sought to limit the circulating medium. Accordingly, in 1816, bankers and financial interests, including the Rothschild family, secured the demonetization of silver in Great Britain. They perceived that if money was scarce it would be dear and commodities would be cheap. Industrialists in Great Britain, knowing that their country had but a limited supply of raw materials, believed that it would be to their advantage if a monetary system were adopted that would cheapen commodities and increase the price of money measured by toil and commodities.

British consols and other securities, following the Napoleonic wars, were held by the Rothschilds and a limited number of bankers, and they secured legislation in 1816 which closed the mints of Great Britain to the coinage of silver and practically placed Great Britain upon a gold-standard basis. The obligations of the Government then became payable in gold and, with the demonetization of silver, gold appreciated in value measured by commodities; as a consequence of which bonds, consols, and other securities became more valuable. The value of raw materials needed by Great Britain, when measured by gold, were of less value. This was the first important assault made upon bimetallism and its consequences in Great Britain were calamitous. The values of commodities were reduced; tens of thousands of landowners lost their holdings; wages were reduced; and poverty and distress came to the British people. France, the United States, and other nations did not then follow Great Britain, but continued their use of gold and silver as basic money. Predictions were made by eminent economists and statesmen that the destruction of either gold or silver as primary money would result in disastrous consequences to the people. When Germany defeated France in 1871, she exacted a monetary indemnity consisting of $1,000,000,000 in gold. France paid this stupendous sum, and thereupon Germany—doubtless influenced by the course of Great Britain in 1816—demonetized silver and adopted the gold standard.

I might add parenthetically at this point that there is much hypocrisy in the contention that silver is unworthy of the position of primary money and that gold alone is entitled to the high distinction of being basic money. Germany's course emphasizes this fact. When California and Australia, between 1849 and 1856, were pouring into the channels of trade and commerce great streams of gold, Germany and a number of other European nations contended that gold was the cheap metal, that silver alone was worthy to be crowned as primary or basic money, and therefore demonetized gold. But when the stream of gold was greatly reduced, and the silver mines of Nevada gave to the world hundreds of millions of ounces of silver, then Germany contended that silver was the cheap money and gold alone was primary money.

As Senators know, our monetary system was bimetallic. The Constitution recognized that fact, and bimetallism was adhered to by our Government until 1873. I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate to point out the devious course pursued by certain interests in the United States following the Civil War, a course which culminated in the demonetization of silver in 1873. A measure was passed by Congress, which it has been charged was done surreptitiously if not corruptly, which in effect resulted in the demonetization of silver and the enthronement of gold as the sole basic money of our Government.

President Grant, a year after he had signed the bill, made inquiries as to why silver was not being minted, and when told that silver had been demonetized, demonetized by an act which he signed, he expressed surprise and insisted that he was not aware when he signed the bill that its effect was to close the mints of the Government to the free coinage of silver.

Similar serious economic and industrial disturbances resulted in the United States by reason of the demonetization of silver, as had occurred in Great Britain following the adoption of the gold standard there in 1816. Between 1873 and 1880 property values in the United States shrank hundreds of millions of dollars. Unemployment was Nation-wide and a depression more serious than any the country had ever passed through was visited upon the people. In 1896 we were still suffering from the evil effects of silver's demonetization.

I might add in passing that the great leaders of the Republican Party—McKinley, Garfield, even John Sherman, and others—had declared in favor of bimetallism, and yet, in 1896, when the issue was sharply drawn, the Republican Party condemned Mr. Bryan and the Democrats because of their demand that silver be restored to the high station which it occupied from the foundation of the Government until it was struck down in 1873. With the defeat of Mr. Bryan, the gold monometallists rejoiced here as elsewhere. They believed that bimetallism was dead and that gold alone was to be primary money.

Mr. President, I beg to assert that sooner or later the people of this and other countries will realize that the assault upon silver was a serious wrong, the effects of which have been visited upon many lands and the evil consequences of which still persist. So long as it becomes necessary to have a metallic base so long it is imperatively required that that base be sufficiently broad to sustain the currencies and credits of the world. The narrow base of gold, consisting of approximately $11,000,000,000, is wholly inadequate to meet the demands of individuals, communities, and nations. The inadequacy of the gold standard is demonstrated every day. The demands for irredeemable paper money for wild inflationary schemes are strengthened by reason of the fact that the people believe that the gold standard has failed, that the monetary supply of gold is not sufficient to maintain the credits and to meet national as well as international requirements.

It is admitted by gold monometallists that the monetary policies of the world are unsound, as a result of which many schemes are suggested to relieve the financial situation, to increase prices, and to lead the world from the valley of depression to the uplands of peace and prosperity; but most of them lack merit or validity. More and more it is recognized that the rehabilitation of silver would lead the way out of the financial and economic morass in which we find the world.

Mr. President, I have very imperfectly and, of course, very inadequately responded to the inquiry of my learned friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to say that the reply of the Senator has been comprehensive and very informing, for which I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate the generous sentiment of my friend, the Senator from Illinois.

I now return to the matter under discussion. The Democratic Party declared in its platform in favor of silver's rehabilitation, and President Roosevelt indicated his approval of the resolution. That he will exercise all rightful authority to redeem the pledge of his party, I have no doubt. The policy of the administration thus far indicates that the gold standard, as it has been understood and applied since 1873, when silver was demonetized in the United States, does not satisfactorily meet the economic and industrial conditions of this and other countries.

When the National Economy Emergency Act was under consideration in May of last year, the question of giving to silver an improved monetary status was under consideration. Senator WHEELER and myself prepared an amendment to this measure which authorized the President to fix the weight of the silver dollar in grains 0.9 fine, as a definite fixed ratio, in relation to the gold dollar, at such amounts as he finds necessary and to provide for the unlimited coinage of such gold and silver at the ratio so fixed. This amendment was accepted and became a part of the act referred to.

In addition, the act contains a provision "that all forms of money issued or coined by the United States" which, of course, includes all our silver currency, shall be full legal tender for all debts, both public and private. This provision gives to our standard silver dollars, as well as all silver currency, the status of primary money. It is a recognition of the importance and necessity of supplementing gold and adding to the metallic monetary base of our financial system.

There are some persons who are demanding that several billion dollars of irredeemable paper money be issued by the Federal Government. Some within this class would make all currency irredeemable in specie and would use silver only as token money. In my opinion the American people will not accept this view; they will not follow the inflationary policies of Germany and Russia; they prefer rather the faith of the fathers and will contend that gold and silver shall constitute the metallic base upon which to rest the credits and currencies of the Government. It is believed by many that if resort were had to large issues of irredeemable paper money the remonetization of silver would be postponed for an indefinite period. I believe the time is ripe when the true friends of silver should unite to secure its rehabilitation. Personally, I am in favor of bimetallism in the sense that that word has been used. I favor the unlimited coinage of gold and silver at a ratio to be agreed upon—preferably 16 to 1—and that all forms of money issued or coined shall be maintained at a parity at the ratio fixed.

Notwithstanding the fact that the price of gold as fixed by the Treasury varies from day to day, I do not regard this situation as an obstacle to the fixing of a ratio between silver and gold, and the adoption of a bimetallic or double standard based upon the ratio so fixed. In my opinion, now is the time for the friends of silver to unite in an effort to secure by legislation, in the event that the President shall not exercise the authority conferred upon him by the act of May 12 of this year, the restoration of silver to its high station as a part of the primary money of our country.

I have no doubt that if the United States shall adopt bimetallism, other nations will promptly follow its lead. Mexico and the Central and South American Republics are not only friendly to silver but, in my opinion, will welcome bimetallism; and when I use the term "bimetallism" I mean the use of both gold and silver as equal bases for all currency issues. I mean that both gold and silver, at the ratio so fixed and all currency issued, shall perform all monetary functions and shall be receivable in payment of all debts, public and private. The silver question in this broad aspect is not a partisan question, but it is one which affects the interest of all countries and all peoples.

Genuine bimetallists are not so much concerned in helping silver as they are in benefiting the world.

While it is true that the mineral products of our country would be increased in value, the question at issue far outweighs any consideration of that character. The world today needs a broader metallic base, a sounder financial structure, and a better monetary system.

With silver and gold linked together, performing the functions of primary money, and constituting the solid base upon which currencies rest, confidence in our financial system will be restored and an important step will be taken toward relieving this and other countries from the depression which has brought such woe and sorrow to the peoples of the world.

Mr. President, recently a committee was organized by the governors of the 11 Western States for the specific purpose of assisting the President of the United States and Congress in their efforts to stabilize the relation of the white metal to gold in the monetary systems of the world, in order that economic conditions may be improved. Mr. George W. Malone, State engineer of Nevada, was named as the chairman of the commission so created.

A statement has been prepared by him, representing the commission referred to, which embodies, as he states, the principles necessary to be included in any legislation on this important matter. The statement, together with supporting data, analyzes the two fundamental principles upon which, he declares, bimetallists can agree, namely: "First, that silver must be a primary or basic money metal by law, and, second, that the price must be stabilized in the proper relation to gold, by law."

I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be printed in the RECORD and also that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the request was granted.

The statement is as follows:

STABILIZATION OF GOLD AND SILVER (S.Doc. No. 111)

(Statement by George W. Malone, State engineer of Nevada and chairman of the silver committee, created by the governors of the 11 Western States)

This committee was created for the specific purpose of assisting the President of the United States and our national representatives in their efforts to stabilize the relation of the white metal to gold in the monetary system of the world to the end that general economic conditions may be improved.

PRESIDENT'S ANNOUNCEMENT

President Roosevelt's recent announcement providing for additional coinage of silver at the stabilized price of 64.5 cents an ounce is regarded as the first definite step toward the rehabilitation of silver but is not in itself alone sufficient to restore the white metal to its necessary monetary place or to affect permanently commodity prices.

PRINCIPLES

There are two definite basic principles that silver and monetary experts generally agree must be adopted if any permanent results are to be had, neither of which has so far been done:

First. That silver must be reestablished as a primary money metal by law, along with gold.

Second. That the price must be stabilized in the proper relation to gold, by law.

STABILIZATION

The specific reason for establishing the two metals as primary money and stabilizing the proper relation between them is, to quote that eminent world-recognized authority on monetary matters, Edward Tuck, that "in studying the question of bimetallism one should keep clearly in mind: First, money is not the value for which, but the value by which, commodities are exchanged and debts are paid."

If that is true, and it is so clear that it hardly admits of argument, then any system that contemplates a constantly changing value for money and a stabilized price for commodities would be comparable to a changeable length for a yardstick and a stabilized price per yard for all kinds of cloth; the thing that obviously defeats the theory, even if it were possible to change the standard length of the yardstick every day, is the changing relation between the value of the different kinds of cloth itself. It is evident that the first important thing is a standardized yardstick, and money is the yardstick of value.

FREE COINAGE

The bugaboo of the free and unlimited coinage of silver has been the fear that we would be flooded with all the silver of all the countries of the world.

It will be remembered that we are now definitely a creditor instead of a debtor Nation; therefore the tide of exchange has turned. In addition to this fact, we are owed approximately $4,000,000,000 by these nations.

If this were not true and all of the available silver did come into the United States Treasury, it was established by the Somers Congressional Committee after an exhaustive investigation in 1932–33, that approximately 600,000,000 ounces of silver would be the absolute outside figure that is available and could be be brought in.

It will be seen that this would have very little influence as against the gold now in the United States, especially when the new price is considered. If this be true, then only two other things could happen:

1. They could return the certificates to the United States Treasury and demand their silver back, in which case we would be out nothing but the cost of the transaction; or

2. They could buy goods in the United States with the certificates, in which case our foreign trade would be accelerated to that extent with the silver-producing nations and would undoubtedly result in higher commodity prices.

Additional metal backing is a widely recognized necessity for the approximately $5,600,000,000 worth of currency outstanding in America, and silver should be remonetized as a basic money metal with gold in the proper economic relation if commodity prices are to be permanently affected.

COMMODITY PRICE EFFECT

This will prevent a recurrence of what history shows to be always the result of setting a commodity price on the white metal. The war time purchasing act is an example. This provided for the melting and sale of 200,000,000 silver dollars then held in the United States Treasury, to England at $1 per ounce, to be replaced from domestic production at the same price. This resulted, to quote that eminent jurist, Frank H. Norcross, of Nevada, United States Federal Court, western jurisdiction, who, in 1922, said: "Whatever may be said for the gold standard, it cannot be said that it had its inception in any spirit of altruism.

"For a score or more of years Uncle Sam has been supplying 40 percent of the world's silver output. It would seem that he has failed to comprehend the importance of that fact. For a recent illustration: Uncle Sam produced 75,000,000 ounces of silver in 1915. That year the ratio of production of silver to gold was the lowest of record, 7 to 1. With war prices on other products prevailing, Uncle Sam, without protest, permitted British influences to drop the price to the lowest figure in the history of the metal, a price ratio of 40 to 1. Great Britain needed silver badly for her East Indian colonies, where it was transferred at a profit of 300 percent. A couple of years later more silver was required for India than the regular market afforded. Uncle Sam was offered a dollar an ounce for his whole Treasury stock. Apparently delighted over the opportunity, he shipped to India nearly 300,000,000 ounces—all he had. Great Britain only made a trifle less than a hundred million dollars on that deal and still owes us for the silver." After this transfer was accomplished silver was again forgotten. The total amount was never replaced at the agreed price. Any plan other than a definite place as primary money and the relation between the metals established by law will again, in the last analysis, subject this important metal to the same treatment.

The monetary history of the nations shows periodical attempts to gain advantage by manipulation of the money standards of the world, which in every case has been only temporarily successful. The pendulum has swung back and forth two or three times from a bimetallic to a single standard and it would seem from recent events that we are about ready to again recognize the truth of the statement quoted by Tuck, of that great economist Turgot, who, as Minister of Finance to Louis XVI, said, "Gold and silver are constituted money, and universal money, by the nature of things, independently of all convention and all law."

England has always taken the lead in establishing the value and the relation between the money metals, and it has not always operated to our advantage. Eighty percent of the silver of the world is produced in North America, yet the silver market is fixed in London; therefore, it is believed that the time has now arrived for the United States to set the pace and establish the kind and amount of our medium of exchange best suited to serve the majority of our people.

PRODUCTION AND PRICE

If the United States were to purchase the entire annual domestic output of silver at the present legal figure of $1.29 an ounce, instead of the announced price of 64.5 cents, and the production should again reach the normal of approximately 50,000,000 ounces annually, which is practically twice the present output, it would take fully 20 years to add a billion dollars to the currency For over 400 years the ratio of world production of silver to that of gold has been approximately 15 to 1.

SUPPORT

It is thought that these principles may bring together 3 out of the 4 distinct groups, the inflationists, the ultra-conservatives, and the primary money-silver group, leaving only the commodity-silver purchase advocates. It would provide conservative, safe, and sound expansion of the monetary system.

COOPERATION

As long as the President's action can be regarded as a preliminary effort to arrive at a proper price to stabilize the relation between the two metals, the silver-producing States, which include Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Vermont, in addition to the 11 Western States of Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, New Mexico, Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada, will continue to cooperate with him.

EFFECT OF STABILIZATION

Even if none of the things is brought about which leading economists predict will be the result of stabilizing the price of gold and silver in their proper relation, such as increased foreign trade with the silver-using nations, with the natural result of increased commodity prices, all agree that metal-backed currency is more stable than paper because the metal itself has an intrinsic value without the Government stamp, and in addition, all agree that the metal-producing States will immediately start to absorb their own available labor supply and to purchase materials and supplies from other States. It will do for these States what the cotton, wheat, corn, and hog program is designed to do for the States producing these commodities, and is an essential part of the whole recovery program.

It is freely predicted that if the price of gold and silver is stabilized by law at their proper relative values the unemployment problem in the 11 Western States will be reduced to a minimum in a relatively short time.

EFFECT OF PRESENT PRICE

Some have called the increased price of 64.5 cents per ounce for silver a 50 percent bonus for the producer, when as a matter of fact, with the price of silver dollars set by law at $1.29 per ounce, it will still mean a profit for the Government of 100 percent if silver certificates are issued against the silver accumulated in the Treasury by this method. On a basis of the former price of 32 cents per ounce the Government made a profit of over 400 percent when the silver dollars were coined.

METAL OR PAPER

Metallic money back of currency is the soundest way to insure full confidence in the monetary system, and if a person holding a piece of paper money knows that he can get a chunk of metal for it—with the metal itself bearing an intrinsic value—that person will not worry about the safety of the currency. Numerous economists believe that more money should be in circulation, and a restoration of silver to its basic place of centuries as a primary money metal would bring about a further expansion of the circulating medium.

PRODUCTION BY-PRODUCT

The average annual production of silver in the United States during the last 30 years has approximately been 55,000,000 ounces, falling as low as 30,000,000 ounces in 1931. The world's annual production has ranged from 175,000,000 to 250,000,000 ounces, with the United States, Mexico, and Canada producing more than 60 percent of the entire amount. Most of the silver production comes as a by-product from copper, lead, zinc, and gold mines and not from pure silver mines; therefore there would be no substantial increase in the annual production of silver until there was an increased demand for these other metals.

An increase in the price of silver would not enable these other mines to go blasting into production, because the silver content of their ores would not justify operating unless the prices of the other metals were much higher than their present levels. Then commodity prices must increase before anyone benefits.

RATIO PRICE AND PRODUCTION

During the last 2 centuries silver has fluctuated from a ratio of from 15 to 1 to 77 to 1 with respect to gold, and these extreme variables are not justified by the record inasmuch as the production of silver in the past 400 years has been approximately 15 times the production of gold in ounces.

METHOD

We are not advocating bimetallism, symetallism, or a purchase program as such, but the Western States feel that if commodity prices are to be permanently affected that the two main principles must be recognized and established by law: First, that silver shall be a primary money metal, which position it held throughout the world until 1873; and, second, that the price or value in buying power terms of an ounce of silver be stabilized in the proper economic relation to gold.

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS WITH DEFAULTING FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 682) to prohibit financial transactions with any foreign government in default on its obligations to the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 1, line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "people" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to any citizen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the words "United States", to insert the words "or to any corporation organized in the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment, the question is, Shall the bill be ordered to a third reading and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it may be that some Senators who are not now in the Chamber desire to be here when the bill shall be finally acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know of none.

Mr. KING. I may say, then, that I have no objection, with the understanding that if it should develop that some Senator desired to be present, I may move for a reconsideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to purchase or sell the bonds, securities, or other obligations of any foreign government issued after the passage of this act, or to make any loan to such foreign government, including any political subdivision thereof, while such government or political subdivision is in default in the payment of its obligations, or any part thereof, to the Government and/or to any citizen of the United States or to any corporation organized in the United States. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 2. As used in this act the term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day, while I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber, it appears that a bill was considered and passed by the Senate which penalizes with a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, any purchase or sale of securities issued by a foreign government at a time when the foreign government is in default on indebtedness to this Government or to any citizen or corporation of this Government.

That means, according to the express language employed, that if a person owns a bond issued by one of the foreign governments in default on its obligations to this country, or to any citizen or corporation in this country, and sells it to another citizen of the United States, he commits a penitentiary offense. It means that every foreign bond now possessed by a citizen of the United States is, by provision of law, made nontransferable, and the holder of the bond, no matter what his extremity or his necessity may be, if he sells it, is subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary and to heavy fine.

I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, is it possible that a provision of that seriousness escaped the attention of the members of the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not only possible but it is literally true. The language of the bill as reported is as follows:

That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to purchase or sell the bonds or other obligations of any foreign government, including any political subdivision thereof, while such government or political subdivision is in default in the payment of its obligations, or any part thereof, to the Government and/or to any citizen of the United States or to any corporation organized in the United States. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 2. As used in this act the term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

I do not know the limitations in the mind of the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who introduced the bill. I am sure that he did not intend to render valueless or nontransferable bonds that are owned by citizens of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I understood that the bill had been amended so that it applied only to securities issued after the passage of the act. It does not include what the Senator has in mind at all. If it does, it is not at all what I thought it was.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is, I find on examination of the desk copy, in the draft as it was finally passed, an amendment limiting the application of the penalty to securities issued after the passage of the act. But, Mr. President, this is a very extraordinary bill even as modified. It is a very extraordinary provision of law to put a man in the penitentiary, or fine him $10,000, for buying a bond or other security.

I enter a motion to reconsider the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I suggest, if it is desired to argue the proposition, that we argue it and present it fully? I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall not go further into the matter while the Senator from New York has the floor. I was induced to make the statement that I did by questions that were asked. I find that the bill was amended so as to make it applicable only to securities issued after the passage of the act. I enter the motion and will confer with the Senator from California and other Senators about the matter hereafter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say that while I was on the floor, and was discussing another measure, and was being called from the Chamber, I suggested to the Senator from California that I might call for a quorum and asked him if there was any objection, so far as he knew, to the bill. Upon receiving what I believed to be his assurance that he knew of no objection, I stated that I would not call for the quorum, but if later I desired to have the passage of the bill set aside, I understood the Senator to say that he would assent to that and restore it to the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I should have been delighted to argue the measure, and argue it elaborately or in any other way, ever since its introduction.

This is no new bill that comes before the Senate. This is a bill that was introduced in the last session, that went to the Judiciary Committee. that was approved by the Judiciary Committee, and a report filed here. Not only that, but at the very beginning of this session I stood upon the floor of the Senate and gave notice that I would call up this bill and press it to a conclusion at the earliest possible moment. It is no. 1 on the calendar.

Yesterday, in the debate that ensued upon the amendment presented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I called attention to the bill, and to the fact that it was number 1 upon the calendar; and today it was the first bill called.

I want no man to have any misunderstanding or any misconception of the measure; and I shall be delighted to take it up in any fashion that may be desired and argue it upon the floor or meet with my friend from Arkansas and talk over the matter in any way that he may desire.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I content myself with merely entering the motion to reconsider now, and we will discuss the subject and confer about it later.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, would the Senator object to restoring the bill to the calendar?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it stay as it is. The motion has been made. I will do nothing in the interim, and then we will confer respecting it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The motion that has been made will delay the sending of the bill to the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. JOHNSON. I assume so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I am entirely content with the arrangement to which the Senator has agreed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very happy that that has been done, because I had an understanding with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that he would call a quorum if the bill was put upon its passage; and I did not know it had been put upon its passage because a quorum was not called, as has been explained by the Senator from Utah. Therefore,

I am very happy that the Senator from California is willing to let that course be taken.

SUPERVISION OF FOREIGN COMMERCIAL TRANSACTIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 882) to provide for the more effective supervision of foreign commercial transactions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that that bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask whether it is the intention to go through the calendar and as to how many bills there are on the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there are about 20 bills on the calendar.

Mr. COPELAND. I must be away for a few days and I desire to get the floor for a short time, but I shall wait until the morning hour is ended. I give notice now of my desire to take the floor at 2 o'clock.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the able leader on the other side, I may say that many of the Senators are engaged in important committee meetings—a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency and many others. Some 12 or 14 Senators, members of a committee with which I am identified, will be compelled to meet at 2 o'clock to consider a bill which must be reported as soon as possible. The subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presided over by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], is in session, and there are others in session requiring the attendance of Senators.

Mr. McNARY. I have anticipated that situation, and I ask unanimous consent that we defer further consideration of the calendar for the day.

Mr. KING. I suggest that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] be given opportunity to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. McNARY. I think that has been arranged for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the calendar will be laid aside for the day.

RESTRICTION OF CRIMINAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, several important votes were taken this morning. I am sorry I was not here to record my preference regarding each of the matters before the Senate. It so happened that I was detained at the White House by the President, and I am anxious to have this reference in the RECORD so that it will be apparent that I was not evading any votes which were taken.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that last spring toward the end of the session the Senate saw fit to adopt a resolution submitted by me directing the Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, to investigate the subjects of kidnaping, racketeering, and other forms of crime. Acting on that instruction the Commerce Committee appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], and myself as chairman. This committee has been very active during the past summer and fall. Hearings were held in various parts of the country, notably in New York, Detroit, and Chicago, and certain conclusions have been reached by the subcommittee, conclusions which, I assume, should now be presented to the Senate.

In making this presentation, we wish it to be understood that this is a preliminary report. Our activities have demonstrated that there are many crimes which deserve the serious attention of the Senate. We shall expect from time to time to present our conclusions so far as they are formulated, in order that any legislation which may be required shall be promptly enacted.

This morning we have 13 bills to present for the consideration of various committees of the Senate. I know that that seems like a tremendous grist to put into the legislative mill, but many of the measures proposed relate to trifling changes in existing law. Those measures are intended to stop gaps through which criminals make their slimy way.

In addition to the measures to correct existing law, we are presenting some other plans and bills which we hope will add to the protection of the American people against crime and the criminal.

I regret to say, but I think it is a fact, that the popular idea in this country is that there has been a break-down in the administration of criminal law. It so happens that every member of the subcommittee is a layman, so far as law is concerned, and perhaps it was wise that in the selection of the committee there should be appointed men who may be considered outsiders. Perhaps we were less bound by tradition and legend than men skilled in the profession of the law might be.

I wish to state, however, that in the preparation of the measures which we will present we have had the hearty support and cooperation of the Department of Justice. The Attorney General himself is much concerned over criminal activities in America. Through his instruction his assistants have given the committee every possible aid. I wish to speak particularly about Mr. Joseph B. Keenan, who is the Assistant Attorney General in charge of investigation of criminal activities. Mr. Keenan has shown not only an interest in this matter but he has brought to bear upon it an intelligence and professional skill which I think are quite unusual. We have had the aid, too, of the old-time experts of the Attorney General's Office. Therefore, Mr. President, I should not wish you to think that because we upon the committee are laymen we have failed to avail ourselves of the most expert legal advice we could find.

In that connection, too, may I mention that through these various hearings we have had the testimony and the advice not alone of officials of government, United States district attorneys, and other officials of the Federal Government but we have had also the hearty cooperation and assistance of State officials. Men from my own State—judges, district attorneys, and eminent lawyers—have appeared and given testimony and advice. We had in Detroit the advice of the able prosecuting attorney of Wayne County and other officials of that State. In Chicago we had a great gathering of United States district attorneys, State prosecuting officers, and others.

We have had also the assistance of police officers, the International Police Conference, and other active police agents. All this work has demanded attention to many details.

The committee is unanimous in the feeling that we have been very fortunate in having Col. Franklin S. Hutchinson, of Rochester, N.Y., as the official in charge of the investigation. He has from the beginning been actively at work, and still is, and the Senate owes a great debt of gratitude to Colonel Hutchinson because of his work.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, while the Senator is referring to those to whom gratitude is due for the useful results and valuable information gathered by this subcommittee, I should like to offer an observation as a member of the subcommittee. I should like to say that the net results of this undertaking, which is now being submitted by the Senator from New York, and which, in my judgment, represents one of the major challenges to this session of the Congress, would never have accrued except for the leadership of the Senator from New York himself; and as one who has been permitted to labor in a humble capacity in connection with this undertaking, I wish to state for the RECORD that the Senate and the country are under a great obligation to the Senator from New York, not only for initiating this inquiry but for the emphasis he has put upon it and the superlative results which he has primarily inspired.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, of course, I am very grateful to my colleague for his kind words, but I shall not be outdone by him. I wish to say that if there had been any holding back on the part of my colleagues on the subcommittee, it would not have been possible to make such progress as we have made; and I wish to return my thanks to the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Iowa for the very energetic and intelligent assistance they have given.

I would not wish to close this preliminary statement without referring to the fact that the President of the United States is tremendously interested in what we are attempting to do. No later than this morning he has told me of his desire to have adopted a program which will make safer the citizens of America. There is not a mother in this country who is not alarmed over the possibility of kidnaping in her family; and, in that connection, I may say that there is not a family in America safe against the menace of kidnaping.

I shall speak of one other person, one of the secretaries of the President, Col. Louis Howe, who has been interested in this subject for many years, and who has given the chairman of the committee much wise advice. He brought to my attention the names of a good many persons who were known to him to be interested in this problem.

The bar associations, not alone of my city but of many other cities, have had their attention focused upon this matter; the American Bar Association also is interested in it, and let me say to my colleagues in the Senate that if they could have had the personal experiences during the past 6 months that we have had, they would be restless and sleepless until they should have found some way of dealing with criminals. There are places in America where orderly government has disappeared, where the underworld is in control. I do not wish to indulge in any extravagant statement, but I am here to say that unless America shall be aroused the underworld gangster will come more and more into control in the United States.

I see in the Senate gallery now a man whom I mentioned a moment ago, the able Assistant United States Attorney, Mr. Joseph B. Keenan. He went into the West, and through his efforts and by his aid the local officials were able to bring to the bar of justice and to sentence, many desperate criminals, some of the most dangerous men who have ever preyed upon society in America.

If we have accomplished nothing else, I feel that we have succeeded in arousing some degree of public sentiment. Without public sentiment there cannot be such an administration of criminal law as there must be if we are to be safe in our homes, in our persons, and in our property.

Who are these criminals? One perhaps thinks about a criminal as a man 35 or 40 or 45 years of age who, through a lifetime of criminality, has developed a certain genius in the direction of the perpetration of crime and the carrying out of criminal plans. I assure Senators that if they think that to be the case they are greatly mistaken.

I have been invited many times to go to the line-up at the police headquarters in New York City. I never did go. I hate crime and despise criminals, but it was demonstrated in the various hearings that it was necessary we should go to the very bottom of this evil. So while we were in Chicago the committee went to the line-up in the central headquarters of the police department of that great city. We went at midnight and witnessed what I am about to describe.

If Senators are unfamiliar with the "line-up", so called, let them imagine a room with a long platform like a stage in a theater, a platform brightly illuminated. In front of this, in the auditorium, are the detectives. The arrested persons are required to march across the platform and stand there until their faces and figures are made familiar to the detectives and while the prisoners are walking across, their gait is studied.

Mr. President, I was horrified to find in that line-up a great many persons, not one 25 years of age but all younger than that; and over half of these men were out on probation or parole, showing that at this youthful age they were already hardened criminals or repeaters in crime.

In the great prison at Sing Sing, in New York, 80 percent of the prisoners are under 30 years of age and over half of them under 21. The average age of the criminals in America is 23 years; the largest age group is found at 19 years and the second largest age group at 18 years.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the Senator's study carried him to the background of heredity and pathological and other basic factors that have resulted in these young men's developing into criminals?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad the Senator from West Virginia asked the question, for he is a distinguished physician and a man of great experience, a thoughtful man. I may say that we have inquired, and at some time, either today or at another time, I shall present to the Senate what convictions we have formed regarding the life history, the inheritance, and the traits of persons who are under conviction or who are charged with crime.

In my opinion, may I say to my friend from West Virginia, one of the defects in the administration of criminal justice lies in the methods of sentencing men who have been found guilty of crime. Every person brought to the bar of justice and found guilty of a crime, particularly a crime of violence, should, after conviction and before sentence, be examined medically, mentally, physically, and psychologically. There ought to be another body of equal dignity with the court to pass judgment on what shall be done with the convicted person after the conviction is established by the court. That answers the question of the Senator, but today I shall not enlarge upon it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thoroughly concur in what the Senator says. In justice and humanity, that principle should be adopted and worked out.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I am convinced that, in addition to the courts that pass judgment and determine the guilt of a prisoner, there should be another body of equal dignity to determine what shall be done with the victim after he shall have been found guilty of crime. I presume the Senator from West Virginia concurs in that suggestion?

Mr. HATFIELD. I concur in it whole-heartedly, Mr. President.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is the youth who is the criminal. I cannot see why every father and mother in America should not be aroused over the danger, the menace, the possibility of crime entering that particular household.

Education, Mr. President, is not enough to do away with the development of criminal instincts. The most dangerous criminal often is the man who has the best education; his very education becomes an aid to him in the progress of his criminal career.

The questions which have been asked divert me from the thought I had in mind. Nevertheless, it may not be inappropriate now to say that, in my opinion, there is something wrong with the church and the school and the home in America. I have no right to criticize the church, except my own church. I am critical of my own church in its failure to inculcate in the hearts of those who are associated directly or indirectly with it, those high motives which make not alone for spirituality but which make also for good citizenship. But I have no right to criticize other denominations.

I do want to say, however, that in a notable book on Crime and the Criminal, written by Judge Marcus Kavanagh, of Chicago, a man who was for many, many years upon the bench, I find a remarkable statement. In that book Judge Kavanagh said that when the churches are full the prisons are empty. He said that 1850 was the low-water mark of criminal activities in the country; that at that time with a population of 23,000,000 there were less than 7,000 prisoners in all the prisons of the country committed there for major or minor offenses. I followed up this hint given by Judge Cavanaugh, thinking I should like to find what happened later. I did not take the figures of the last census because that was taken during the prohibition era, when there were many arrests, and I feared that we might get some misconception of the real contrasting figures; so I took 1910.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I give notice at this time that on next Tuesday, the 16th, I desire to address the Senate on the subject of the fourteenth anniversary of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would not deprive my friend from Texas of that annual privilege which he has had, and I shall be anxious to hear his speech to learn just exactly how he feels in the light of recent events.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank my friend from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. In 1850, in the United States the total number of prisoners in all the institutions was 6,637. This means that for every 100,000 population there were in jail at that time 29 prisoners. Instead of taking the figures during the prohibition period I took the figures, as I said, of 1910. The population then had increased from 23,000,000 to a little less than 92,000,000. The total number of prisoners in 1910 in all our jails was 111,498. This represents 121 prisoners for every 100,000 population.

I know how difficult it is to compare census figures of one decade with those of another, but from all the evidence I can obtain, crime is three times as prevalent today as it was in 1850. Senators may draw their own conclusions. Judge Kavanagh said it is because the churches are not as active now as in olden times. I hope this statement will be read by ministers and that we may have the comments of other members of the clergy than those we have already had before our committee.

I said I have no right to criticize the church except my own. I do not know how to reach the home. I suppose the home would be reached through the church. I am not an authority on that subject by any means.

But the third factor of defect in our social life is the school. Every citizen has a right to criticize the school if he is so disposed. I am not disposed to be very critical. It would not be right for one who is a product of the public school. My entire education was obtained in the public schools—in the grammar school, in the high school, in the State normal college, and later in a State university maintained by public funds. I would be the last one in the world to find serious fault with the schools.

As a matter of fact, the parents of America see fit to farm out their children to school teachers. They depend upon the school teachers to teach the youngsters, not only reading and writing, arithmetic and geography, history and English, and the languages but they leave the school teachers to instruct how to arrange the table, how to cook eggs, how to enter a room, and how to be properly introduced. We give over to the school teachers of America the very manners of the children, and certainly instruction in morals.

There is a great difference of opinion I find among educators as to what ought to be done about this subject. On one of our visits to New York we had a 2-day hearing devoted to juvenile delinquency. We had before us professors, teachers, social workers, police agents, ministers, and many of those interested in the social life as well as criminal administration.

One witness said that morals and ethics cannot be taught by precept, that it can be done only by example. With the belief I have about the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, I should dislike to feel that we could not teach something by precept.

We must find out whether or not the methods of education should be redefined. Are we setting up the proper objectives in education? Are we seeking simply to crowd the little brains of our children with information and failing to impress upon them that the real objectives of school are involved in leading the pupils in the way of becoming good parents and good citizens?

We have now assisting the committee of the Senate a group of educators. At a later time the committee will present to the Senate the suggestions made by these great leaders of educational thought in America as to what may be done through the public schools, through the colleges, and the universities to do away with the development of the criminal instinct. My purpose now is merely to suggest that we have in mind this aspect of the case.

Of course, our primary object was to find out how we could stop crime, how we could stop criminals. Our specific instruction was to deal with two aspects of crime—the so-called "racket" and kidnaping.

I desire to speak first about the rackets, the racketeering, the protective business rackets, the levy of tribute upon society. In this connection I will discuss the economic cost of crime.

Have you any idea how much crime costs America? I am about to give you, very briefly, an outline representing the views of a writer who had investigated this subject as to the cost of crime. If I am not diverted from my thought, I shall make a comment upon the figures. These figures were printed in the Manufacturers' Record 2 or 3 years ago, and I desire to give you a summary of these figures as to the cost of crime.

First. Losses through frauds, including fraudulent securities: We do not have to be reminded in the Congress about the loss to the American people through fraudulent securities. The Banking and Currency Committee has been in session for the past year. It has brought out facts which show a most outrageous state of affairs in the financial world as to fraudulent securities—securities put out under pretense of great worth when they are actually worth nothing. So included in this first category are losses through frauds, including fraudulent securities, embezzlements, forgeries, worthless checks, and fraudulent bankruptcies, amounting to $1,270,000,000—over a billion and a quarter dollars every year.

Second. Property losses through burglarly and robbery: I might say to the Senate that I was on the way over to Chicago for our hearing there I stayed overnight in Erie, Pa., and in the morning my trousers and $400 had disappeared. I thought it was outrageously mean. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] wants to know how I happened to have so much money. I was going to the Fair as well as to this committee meeting, and knowing the prices they charged over there, I thought it would be necessary for my party to have at least that much money. But these criminals robbed the Chairman of the Committee on Crime of his trousers and $400!

I was interested to find, as I shall bring out later, that the average loss from each individual crime is considerably larger than $400. I want my leader to know that I really got off easily.

To revert to the subject in hand, I continue reading this classification:

Second. Property losses through burglary, robbery, transportation thefts, thefts from warehouses and the mails, and the economic value of 12,500 murdered persons total $1,160,000,000 every year. The average number of murders in the United States per year is 12,500, so we have in this second category an annual loss of $1,160,000,000.

Third. Cost of law enforcement, including police and prison budgets, and cost of criminal justice and legal expenditures total $4,000,000,000.

Fourth. The waste of crime. That is another most important item. This includes 500,000 extra policemen—that is, policemen not engaged in traffic regulation but who are directly employed in the apprehension of criminals and the prevention of crime—private detectives and private patrolmen, about 500,000.

Then there are 2,000,000 crimes per year at $1,500 each. These figures are ascertainable from the indemnity companies, insurance companies, and so forth. There are 2,000,000 robberies, crimes, and so forth, with an average loss of $1,500, each year.

Also, the expense of commercialized vice, the drug traffic, the liquor traffic, and the economic value of their victims. The figures in this category total the enormous sum of $6,503,000,000.

According to this record then, the annual cost of crime in the United States reaches the staggering amount of $12,933,000,000.

I believe these figures are dependable. Even though they did not amount to half this, the sum would be staggering; but if they do reach 13 billions, with our annual income reduced now to about 50 billions, it means that 25 cents of every dollar earned in the United States is the amount levied to pay the cost of crime. This is 10 times as great as the combined cost of maintaining the Army and the Navy. It is four times as much as the cost of maintenance of the Federal Government. It represents a sum sufficient to pay every dollar of Federal, State, and local taxation. It represents, as I have said, an amount equal to one fourth of the annual national income. In short, one dollar out of every four we spend is our contribution to the cost of crime.

If we had no other reason than the economic loss, we would be anxious to do what we could to prevent such a waste.

I desire now to speak briefly about the so-called "rackets."

A friend of mine in New York owned a store and decided that he would use it for the sale of automobile accessories. To this end he put a magnificent plate-glass front in his store, really a showcase. When he unveiled it a young man entered his store and said, "You have a beautiful plate-glass front. You should join the Plate Glass Protective Association." My friend said, "What is that?" He said, "We patrol the streets and guard the property of our members." "How much does it cost?" "Fifteen dollars a week."

My friend said, "Why, I cannot pay $15 a week to have my plate glass protected. I will depend upon the insurance companies." "All right," said the walking delegate. He left the store; and the next morning my friend came down and found his plate glass smashed. He collected his insurance, replaced it, and had the same experience over again; and then he could not get any more insurance.

Then what did he do? He paid tribute of $15 a week to this scallawag organization in order that he might do business and preserve his property and display his goods in this plate-glass showcase.

That is a local racket. I am not bringing it to you with any idea that that can be prevented or controlled or regulated by any sort of Federal legislation. I could name you 150 such rackets, including the laundry racket.

If you have a hotel, a man comes in and says, "We want to do your laundry." "We do not want to change. We are satisfied." "All right." The next time the laundry goes out, with these magnificent linen sheets and pillowcases, and towels, and so forth, they put acid on the linen and destroy it, and ultimately force the hotel man to hire that particular laundry.

There are 150 of such rackets, local rackets. As a matter of fact, most crime is local, and most of it must be controlled by local forces—by the police and the judges and the prosecuting attorneys, and so forth, of the locality.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I was wondering how it would be possible for Federal legislation to correct these evils so long as the public will permit it.

Mr. COPELAND. Federal legislation cannot correct these evils so long as business men pay tribute, until courage is put in the hearts of citizens of the United States, and they say, "We will not tolerate this evil."

Mr. FESS. As effective as a penalty might be, there is not any such effective penalty as the condemnation of the public if the public should become aroused.

Mr. COPELAND. Right; and not until the public is aroused locally, so that the police do their duty and the judges do their duty and the jurors do their duty, can we expect to have these nasty, wicked crimes prevented.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from New York deserves the gratitude of the country for making an exposition of such a thing as this as one of the aids to better public opinion.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. The highest tribute we have had came from Mr. Keenan, who said that there has been such an arousing of public sentiment that jurors do their duty. Until we build up character and courage and respect for what citizenship means, we cannot expect to do away with or control crime.

I am not using all these words to convince Senators that I believe it is possible to do away with crime. I know that crime will exist and that there will be criminals until the end of time. Crime started back in the Garden of Eden, and I suppose will be here when the millennium comes. But we can do a lot to stop it; and if we do not stop it orderly government will break down and the underworld will take possession, as it has done in many places, as I stated a few moments ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sure the Senator would not want to be misunderstood in respect to one statement which he recently made, namely, that crime is essentially local.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, it is local in its inception; but in this automotive age it has become so nonlocal and so interstate in character that the very lack of a localized entity is the reason for the committee's work.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope I have not been misunderstood. I insist that the great majority of the crimes which I have included in this list are local, and should be dealt with as such. But, beyond that, as the Senator from Michigan has so well said, in this day of hard-surfaced roads, high-powered automobiles, and airplanes, and with the aid of the telegraph and the telephone and the radio, there are few crimes of organized groups which are not interstate in nature. Of course, we are going to speak about that in connection with the bills which we will present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, he will recall the most vivid example we had of the demonstration of this new interstate character of crime in the testimony of the very able Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Keenan, who had just returned from his Oklahoma prosecution of the Oklahoma kidnapers.

Mr. COPELAND. Successful prosecution.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Successful prosecution, and a very brilliant prosecution. He brought to our notice the fact that while the kidnaping occurred in Oklahoma, the money passed in Minnesota, the hide-out was in Texas, and some of the chief arrests were in Ohio. Obviously it would be impossible to control that type of crime through mere local activity.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is entirely correct.

Before I leave the subject of the rackets I want to give one example of a racket which is not intrastate but is a crime involving interstate activity, and which may properly be considered here, and in the control of which we have prepared bills which will be useful. I refer to the poultry racket.

There is in my city of New York a very large Jewish and Italian population. With those people there is a demand for live poultry. A housewife goes to the poultry market and selects the bird and has it killed in her presence. That industry is so great that it amounts to about $200,000,000 a year in New York City, so it can be seen that it is a tremendous business.

The poultry comes from the West, from Missouri, Arkansas, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and from various southern States. Senators will remember that the geography of New York City is such that the city itself lies on a narrow island, with no freight railroad reaching the island except the New York Central, which comes down the river from Albany. All the other railroads, like the Erie, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, the Delaware & Hudson, the Lackawanna, the Lehigh, and others, unload their freight in Jersey City. In Jersey City, which of course is in New Jersey, across the river from New York, there are poultry terminals.

The poultry is brought from the West in special cars, "Pullman palace cars" for poultry. When the poultry is unloaded from the cars in Jersey City, the birds are put into wooden coops, each coop holding about 20 birds. Those coops, which are very cheap affairs, I suppose can be made for $2. They are loaded on trucks, the trucks are taken across on the ferry to the West Washington Market, or some other market, and there they are unloaded.

In order to get those birds from the car they have to be put into coops, which are rented from a concern having a monopoly, and $1 per trip is charged for them. In order to fill the coop, two men are employed, and then to lift the coop from the platform to the truck, two other men are employed, and the truck must be one which is owned by the monopoly controlling the transportation of live poultry. After the poultry gets across the ferry, two men must be employed to lift the coop off the truck to the sidewalk.

It costs $321 for the 5 days consumed in the transportation of a carload of poultry from Iowa to Jersey City. It costs $387 to unload that poultry in Jersey City and deliver it from Jersey City over to New York, which operation takes 5 hours. The cost of the transaction has been more than doubled by reason of the excessive charges made through these methods demanded in the handling of poultry in the terminal. If they do not hire the right truck and use the right coops the poultry will never reach its destination in salable condition. The poultry racket has become one of the most outrageously dishonest and corrupt and vile industries known to the criminal world.

It is not so true now, but it used to be a common thing for someone to be killed, and that still happens occasionally. The poultry racket has resulted in the loss of many lives. One of the men interested told me once that the poultry business is dishonest from the time the egg is stolen from under the hen to the time the cook takes a little white meat off the wing. It is an outrageous procedure, which costs the consumers of America hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. That is an interstate racket, and we hope we have found a way to control it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. The Senator will recall, in connection with his statement of there being a racket in New York, that no charge is made as to the existence of any such racket in Chicago, where the underworld has been unsuccessful in racketeering the poultry business, owing to the refusal of the men engaged in the business to accede to the demands of the racketeers seeking control of the labor unions; making it evident that it is something which can easily be corrected by law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Iowa, is correct, and I think that his personal efforts in Chicago, through his activities upon this committee, have resulted in a correction of many of the evils which did exist in the poultry industry in that city.

In connection with the poultry industry, I will present the first bill framed by the committee, which is a bill to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act. We ask that this particular bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Its purpose is to place under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture the poultry industry in the same manner in which the industry having to do with cattle and other livestock is placed under that Department. The industry interested in sheep, hogs, goats, and all sorts of animals used for meat, is regulated under the Stockyards Act. If we can amend that act, and include poultry, there will be the same supervision over the terminal charges relative to poultry that is now exercised in relation to livestock.

One of the very common practices found in every large seaport is operated through practically the same methods that I have described in connection with poultry, except that more violence is used. When goods are shipped in from abroad, and are upon the docks of the various seaboards, the same demands are made in the way of excessive charges and the use of monopolistic features that we find in connection with the poultry business. So we also present a bill which seeks to protect trade and commerce against interference by violence, threats, coercion, or intimidation. This bill is presented for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Likewise, we have a bill to amend an act which heretofore has related only to foreign commerce, exportation, so as to include interstate commerce, transportation between the States, in which we seek to enlarge the powers of existing law sufficiently to give protection against such methods as I have described. This bill is presented for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It has been found in cases involving extortion, as in kidnaping cases, that the telephone, the telegraph, the radio, and other means may be used for sending messages, which in many cases would make the crime an interstate crime, and therefore subject to Federal control. Therefore the bill just referred to should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Before we come to the subject of kidnaping, I desire to speak of two other matters which have to do with property rather than persons; and I speak now of a bill which we are presenting which is not new to the Senate. It is new in this form, but has been introduced in the Senate heretofore. This is a bill providing for punishment where securities are stolen and transported in interstate commerce or foreign commerce.

Likewise, we recommend that the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act shall relate to other property than automobiles. We realize the difficulty of administration of this act, so we are seeking to aid the Department of Justice to some extent by providing that the amount involved shall be $1,000 or more, the provision of the bill being:

> Whoever shall transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any goods, wares, or merchandise of the value of $1,000 or more, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment of not more than 10 years, or both.

Senators will recall that in the Dyer Act there is this provision for protection as against stolen automobiles; but it is the feeling of the committee that the provision should be extended to securities and other property as well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Referring to the last bill which the Senator from New York has mentioned, it would further illuminate the record if I were to state that in most instances in the Midwestern States where we have had bank robberies the stolen property has ultimately shown up, usually in Chicago or some other metropolitan city. The only possible way in which the Federal Government could take any share of jurisdiction in respect to the pursuit of the criminal or in the punishment of the crime, other than the authority given them under the Dyer Act with respect to the automobile of the robber if it happened to be stolen, is through some such legislation as that which is here proposed, which brings that robbery within the interstate authority of the Federal Government through pursuit by the Federal Government of the stolen securities. I think the net result is tremendously to strengthen the hands of the local authorities with respect to bank robberies.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator; and in this connection I should like to present for inclusion in the RECORD a memorandum prepared by the Department of Justice relating to the proposed antiracketeering bills which we have presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM REGARDING PROPOSED ANTIRACKETEERING STATUTE

The accompanying draft of the proposed Federal antiracketeering statute is designed to extend Federal jurisdiction sufficiently to permit prosecution of so-called "racketeers" for acts constituting racketeering.

In the past such persons have been prosecuted in the Federal courts for incidental violations of law, such as mail frauds or income-tax evasions. The nearest approach to prosecution of racketeers as such has been under the Sherman Antitrust Act. This act, however, was designed primarily to prevent and punish capitalistic combinations and monopolies, and because of the many limitations engrafted upon the act by interpretations of the courts the act is not well suited for prosecution of persons who commit acts of violence, intimidation, and extortion. Furthermore, the Sherman Act requires proof of a conspiracy, combination, or monopoly, and it is often difficult to prove that the acts of racketeers affecting interstate commerce amount to a conspiracy in restraint of such commerce, or a monopoly. Moreover, a violation of the Sherman Act is merely a misdemeanor, punishable by 1 year in jail plus $5,000 fine, which is not a sufficient penalty for the usual acts of violence and intimidation affecting interstate commerce.

The accompanying proposed statute is designed to avoid many of the embarrassing limitations in the wording and interpretation of the Sherman Act, and to extend Federal jurisdiction over all restraints of any commerce within the scope of the Federal Government's constitutional powers. Such restraints if accompanied by extortion, violence, coercion, or intimidation are made felonies, whether the restraints are in form of conspiracies or not. The proposed statute also makes it a felony to do any act affecting or burdening such trade or commerce if accompanied by extortion, violence, coercion, or intimidation.

The provisions of the proposed statute are limited so as not to include the usual activities of capitalistic combinations, bona fide labor unions, and ordinary business practices which are not accompanied by manifestations of racketeering.

Offenses of the character designed to be prohibited are of such a serious nature that it is believed proper to make them felonies, punishable by imprisonment for not less than 1 year and for as long as the court in its discretion shall determine, and in addition by a fine at least commensurate with the amount of the unlawful gain. In one racketeering case prosecuted under criminal provisions of the Sherman Act the unlawful gain was estimated to exceed $10,000,000 per year, but the fine was limited by the act to $5,000 for each person convicted. Under such circumstances it might be said that crime does pay. The penalty here suggested would cancel the benefits derived from the unlawful venture.

WALTER L. RICE,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. COPELAND. Besides the bills which I have mentioned, we have several which relate to kidnaping.

Kidnaping is in many ways the most terrible of crimes, in my opinion. It does not seem possible that any human being could conspire with others to seize a perfectly innocent person and carry that person away with a view to extorting money from the family.

Of course, all these forms of rackets, as a matter of fact, are not new. We can see today the ruins of the castles on the Rhine and on the Danube where lived the robber barons who collected tribute of this character. Likewise in the East the camel caravans, loaded with spices and other valuables from the East, were levied upon in the past.

There are classical instances of kidnaping, but kidnaping is becoming all too prevalent in the United States. It is our desire to present for the consideration of the Senate bills which will be helpful in controlling this crime.

To this end we present a bill prohibiting the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce, and amending the act to include certain language which I will read. We find, from the evidence adduced before the subcommittee, that there are many appeals made to the police to find persons thought to be kidnaped, or at least to find some means for the return of such persons. Of course, there is always a question as to whether the crime is an interstate crime; whether or not a State line has been crossed in any manner, either by the transportation of the victim or by a message sent by radio or telegraph or otherwise.

A person disappears and the question is, Has he been kidnaped? Many times it is ultimately determined that the victim was actually kidnaped and taken across the State line, as stated by the Senator from Michigan, and as was done in connection with a notable case. It happens then that the Division of Investigation is called in when the clues are cold, when there is no opportunity to study the case at first hand. So the committee has seen fit to recommend an amendment to the so-called "Lindbergh law" providing—

That in the absence of the return of the person or persons so unlawfully seized * * * for or during a period of 3 days, it shall be presumed that such person or persons have been transported in interstate or foreign commerce * * *.

That gives an opportunity for the Federal Government to go in early, not to interfere with the local authorities but to get all the evidence at first hand as early as possible, on the presumption that if the missing person has been gone 3 days he has been transported in interstate commerce.

I should not desire to tire the Senate with any extensive observations relative to these bills, because they are sure to have hearings before the committee, and there will be abundant opportunity to consider their merits or demerits.

Mr. President, we come to the question of dealing with the criminal. One of the most difficult tasks that the prosecutor has in connection with crimes of violence relates to the disappearance of the witnesses. Many a police force—to use the language of that professon—has "worked up" a good case; the evidence seems complete; the prosecutor is hopeful of conviction; and then he finds that his witnesses have disappeared. The problem of the fugitive witness is one of the great problems in the administration of criminal law. That is particularly true of a city like mine where, I might say, we have a 5-cent fare across to Hoboken or over to New Jersey. The witness disappears; he goes into another State; he is sent there either by fear or by a bribe. It is a difficulty that has confronted the prosecutor of Wayne County, in Michigan, where witnesses have disappeared and gone over into Ohio.

What can be done about that? There is no power in the Government to return a witness to a crime. The principal may be extradited, but not the witness. If those of us who are here now, saw a murder committed in the District of Columbia—and perhaps there are those here who would like to have a murder committed [laughter]—were to go across the line into Virginia there is no way in the world that we as witnesses could be brought back. We have here a bill making it a felony for a witness to a crime to flee to another State.

My very old friend and colleague the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] thinks he sees in this an opportunity to help the State courts. We have an agreement in the committee that these bills shall be presented jointly where we are all agreed that they should be so presented; and this one is so presented, but I do not share the optimism of my friend from Michigan as to what can be done under it. He hopes that a witness to a crime against the State law may, by the operation of this proposed law, be brought back by the United States district court, and then, when the witness is returned and within the jurisdiction of the State court, that he may be turned over to the State court for the benefit of the State authorities in carrying on the prosecution. Of course, I do not think that can be done, but nevertheless——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whether the theory of the Senator from New York be a sound one or not, he will agree that undoubtedly there will be infinitely fewer fugitive witnesses as a result of the existence of this proposed statute.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And I remind the Senator that the prosecuting attorney of Detroit and Wayne County testified that, in his judgment, the mere existence of such a statute as this will probably solve 90 percent of his prosecuting difficulties; and if the final 10 percent cannot be overtaken because of the adverse argument the Senator has indicated, nevertheless the correction of 90 percent of the fugitive-witness and the fugitive-defendant difficulties in Detroit will be a stupendous contribution to the public welfare.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan is entirely correct. When it is known that to flee the State is a felony under the Federal law, one whose presence is desired by the State court will hesitate to go away. So it will do great good; I have no doubt about it. I hope it may ultimately be found to be effective with reference to the other 10 percent of the cases.

The bill I present for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary makes it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution or the giving of testimony in certain cases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I have not had an opportunity to hear all the Senator has been saying. I assume he has been discussing some of the evidence presented before the special committee of which he has been chairman and to which he devoted so much time during the recess?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to hear the Senator discuss the conclusions, if any, which the committee reached upon what seems to me to be a very serious aspect of the whole question of crime prevention. Many people are of the opinion—and I am one of them—that the courts fail to deal sufficiently harsh—I think we all agree that they do not deal promptly—with crimes growing out of acts of violence. I should like to have the Senator inform us what recommendations he proposes to make which will tend to awaken the courts to a realization that the leniency displayed in the past when defendants have been brought before them and found guilty of serious acts of violence is not always well directed. Does the Senator comprehend my question?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Let me say to him, as an illustration, that within a few days my attention has been called to three cases in the District of Columbia of a very serious character. One was a case where a woman's throat was slashed by a man engaged in robbing a store; another was a case where a bandit used a gun and shot and wounded two policemen. My recollection is that the penalty imposed was something less than a sentence of 2 years in each case. I must say that I think a contributing factor to the spread of crime, particularly crimes where force is employed, is the leniency manifested by our courts in dealing with that class of criminals.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. Anything he suggests comes from a ripe experience and sound judgment. Of course there must be celerity and certainty. There must be certainty of apprehension of the criminal and celerity in dealing with him. England has a great advantage over us in speed of action.

When it comes to the question of punishment there are two schools of thought. There is the one school believing that the punishment should suit the crime, that there should be great severity in dealing with the criminal.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will keep in mind that I am inquiring only about the use of dangerous weapons.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. In a few moments I shall present the last bill which the Department of Justice regards as the key bill in the control of firearms. But the Senator has asked a question which I desire to answer more fully.

Personally—and I speak only for myself and not for the committee in this—I do not believe that punishment of crime is a deterrent. It will be recalled that years ago in England they had a long list of crimes where death was the penalty—more than 100, my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] informs me sotto voce. Among other crimes the picking of pockets was punishable by death. In order to make this law effective and to give warning to all pickpockets that it meant death if they picked pockets, they had public executions where everybody could come and see the pickpockets killed. They had to give it up because there were too many pockets picked at those public executions, and they had to proceed to some other method of dealing with pickpockets. [Laughter.] Of course that is an extreme case.

But Mr. Lawes, who is the warden at Sing Sing prison and a popular writer on penology and a great student of the subject, is thoroughly convinced that severity of the sentence does not prevent the commission of the particular crime so far as the remainder of society is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. But it does deprive a dangerous character of the opportunity to repeat the crime.

Mr. COPELAND. That is true, but the Senator was not here when I discussed this matter previously. I said, before his return from the committee where he was engaged, that in my judgment there ought to be another body to deal with the prisoner after he has been convicted, a body of equal dignity. Many of the convicted persons are abnormal. They are mentally defective. They are physically defective. They are dangerous and must be dealt with in a way to protect society. But when we find a man who has killed another, simply to execute him does not answer the purpose of society.

It may, so far as he is concerned; but we ought to inquire, I think, about why he is antisocial in his nature, and so forth. Certainly there can be no doubt that when a man in possession of his normal mental processes, who has no excuse by reason of disease or otherwise to fail to act as a rational person, is found to be the possessor of a gun which he does not hesitate to use, he must be dealt with severely. I do not disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts about that.

Mr. WALSH. Has the committee made any investigation of the sentences that have been imposed in the past in the class of cases to which we have made reference?

Mr. COPELAND. The committee is now in process of studying the question.

Mr. WALSH. I mentioned three cases called to my attention in the District of Columbia—cases of highway robbery, where murder was attempted.

Mr. COPELAND. In one of our hearings—and I will not mention the city—it was shocking to find how men who, from my standpoint, ought to be incarcerated for 150 years and who were out of prison in 2 or 3 years. Sometimes on one pretense or another they utterly escaped any punishment whatever.

I spoke about the line-up for police inspection, where half of them were found to be out on probation and parole. There is something utterly wrong with the administration of our laws with regard to probation and parole. When it comes to the question of sentence, that, of course, is open to debate, but certainly no judge is worthy of his high place upon the bench unless he carries out the spirit and intent of the law for the protection of society.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator believe that if an analysis of the cases were made public, it would have a very good effect in calling the attention of the courts to the desire on the part of the public for more severe sentences?

Mr. COPELAND. No Senator in this body has been more diligent and patriotic than the Senator from Massachusetts in the matter of taking the public into his confidence. When we have an aroused public and when they know what is going on in the courts and in police affairs, there will not be this wishy-washy administration of justice.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad the Senator feels that way about the matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to hurry on and get these bills before us. I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is an able lawyer. I call attention to two bills I am about to mention.

We find that many criminals, by the aid of willing accessories in the legal profession, find ways to evade final disposition of the matter before the courts. One of them is by repeated application for writs of habeas corpus. So we are presenting a bill which abolishes the right of appeal in all cases where a writ of habeas corpus has been granted to test the validity of a warrant of removal or the detention thereunder, and, after hearing upon the writ, the defendant has been remanded. In other words, we provide that he can have just one chance for habeas corpus; that he cannot keep it up for the rest of his life.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question, not about that particular matter, but in reference to the granting of paroles by Federal judges under the parole law that was passed some years ago.

Mr. COPELAND. And which I introduced.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; which the Senator from New York introduced. Did the committee take evidence on the subject of paroles, and did the committee find that that law was working well or ill?

I will say to the Senator that so far as I have witnessed its working, it has rather been to the general benefit, in my judgment, of conditions of crime. I recall talking not long ago with one Federal judge who said that more than 90 percent of the men paroled had become good citizens thereafter, and were still good citizens; and I am wondering what the evidence disclosed to the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad the Senator asked the question. I referred to the matter in the first part of my remarks.

I should like to say, first, that I am a firm believer in parole and probation as a general proposition; and, as the Senator has said, I did introduce some years ago the bill relating to the Federal courts. Frankness compels me to say that unless the machinery is provided and the funds voted for efficient application of the parole system it is a bad thing.

We have a very able man in the Department of Justice—Mr. Sanford Bates. He is the Superintendent of Prisons, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. He is the Superintendent of Prisons. He was formerly police commissioner of Massachusetts.

Mr. COPELAND. I regard Mr. Sanford Bates as a very able man. At a time when I was being somewhat shaken in my conviction regarding the value of probation and parole Mr. Bates appeared before our committee as a witness, and he pointed out this fact:

He said, "Suppose a man's sentence is 7 years. It does not matter about the crime; but suppose his sentence is 7 years, and he continues in prison for the full 7 years. He then returns to a cold world, where he has no welcome. He has no job; he has no place; and pretty soon he is rebuffed to the extent of becoming decidedly antisocial. No matter what he was before, he becomes a foe to society, because he is opposed by society."

Mr. Bates pointed out how much better it is to take the man at the end of 4 years, we will say, and put him on parole, so that for 3 years he is under supervision. He is not fully restored to society. Unless he is a decent citizen he can be taken back to prison at any time. Mr. Bates said that in that 3 years there is a rehabilitation of the man both socially, and probably economically. That is right. I believe in that when there is proper application of the law, where there is supervision, and where there is money enough to have the agents, visitors, and so forth. But if we simply take the man out at the end of 4 years, with perhaps only a decent history of being a good prisoner; we take him out and turn him loose without any supervision, and we do not know what is going to become of him. If we are to have probation or parole at all, we must have the man under real supervision. That is the criticism I have to offer of the system as it is applied at present. Where there is actually that supervision after the man leaves prison until the end of his term, then it is a good thing, but otherwise it has no value.

Mr. McKELLAR. He has to have a sponsor under the law.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator knows what that means.

Mr. McKELLAR. Frequently that has a very real meaning. I think the parole system is, on the whole, beneficial to society. I really believe that. It ought to be administered in accordance with the highest principles of justice, and I have no doubt that in most instances it is. Where it will make a better citizen out of a criminal, necessarily it is a good thing.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to repeat what I said, that I believe in it, but unless there are appropriations to build up the machinery for care and supervision of the man when he comes from prison, the whole system breaks down.

Mr. WALSH. Is not that the general practice? It is in my State.

Mr. COPELAND. It is the general practice, perhaps, in most States, so far as the cities are concerned. In the rural sections there is not the same application of the laws which relate to criminal jurisprudence.

The next bill has to do also with the care of the man after he has been captured, and it relates to the abuse of the alibi. The last resort of a lawyer defending a case is to offer an alibi, to attempt to prove that the client was not at the scene of the crime at all, and he springs the alibi proposal at the time when the prosecutor has no opportunity to investigate it. Perhaps the proper decision is not made in the case because of the inability of the prosecutor to break down the alibi. So we propose that the defense of an alibi shall not be interposed in the prosecution of any criminal case in any court of the United States unless notice of an intention to interpose such defense is given and entered on record in the case at the time the man is arraigned for trial. When the case is prepared the lawyer of the defendant says, "I am going to interpose an alibi." Then the prosecutor will have an opportunity to investigate the merit of the defense and find out where the man actually was at the time of the commission of the crime.

Another bill which we have been asked by the Department of Justice to present is one providing that the testimony of any defendant given under authority of this act shall be given before any other testimony for the defense is heard by the court trying the case. If a defendant is going on the stand in his own defense, he must first give his own testimony, and in any such trial or proceeding the husband or wife shall be competent but not compellable to testify for or against the other, but neither shall be competent to testify as to any confidential communications made by one to the other during marriage.

Another bill is one to authorize the consolidation of the investigative agencies of the Government. I will not speak at any length about that now, but the question arises as to whether or not it may not be wise to consolidate the various divisions and bureaus having the duty of investigating activities of one sort or another in customs and post-office frauds and that sort of thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, the secret service of the Treasury Department, the Post Office Department, and the Department of Justice are all to be consolidated. Is that the purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. Let me read it:

> That the President is hereby authorized, by Executive order or orders, to transfer the whole or any part of any or all executive agencies engaged in investigating violations of any laws of the United States—

And so forth.

I have no convictions as to how far it is to go, and I say that now because I know there will be a flood of protests from many who are happy in the particular locations where they are at present. I want to say this, in that regard, that there will be a hearing to bring out whether or not the plan is wise, and how far it should go.
